New Series, | No. 153.

BEADLE'S

No. 464.

Tamona Sonates

Quindaro,

Popular Dime Hand-Books.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

Each volume 100 12mo. pages, sent post-paid on receipt of price-ten cents each

STANDARD SCHOOL SERIES.

1. Dime American Speaker.
2. Dime National Speaker.
3. Dime Patriotic Speaker.
4. Dime Comic Speaker.

5. Dime Comic Speaker.

6. Dime Humorous Speaker.
7. Dime Standard Speaker.
8. Dime Stamp Speaker.
9. Dime Juvenile Speaker.

10. Dime Spread eagle Speaker.

11. Dime Debater and Chairman's Guide.

Dime Exhibition Speaker.
 Dime School Speaker.

Dime Ludicrous Speaker.
 Carl Pretzel's Komikal Speaker.

Dime Youth's Speaker.
 Dime Eloquent Speaker.

18. Dime Hail Columbia Speaker.

Dime Serio-Comic Speaker
 Dime Select Speaker

Dime Melodist. (Music and Words.) School Melodist. (Music and Words.) Dime Dialogues Number Two.
Dime Dialogues Number Three.
Dime Dialogues Number Four.
Dime Dialogues Number Five.
Dime Dialogues Number Six.
Dime Dialogues Number Six.
Dime Dialogues Number Seven.
Dime Dialogues Number Eight.
Dime Dialogues Number Nine.

DIME DIALOGUES.

Dime Dialogues Number Nine.

Dime Dialogues Number Ten.

Dime Dialogues Number Eleven.

Dime Dialogues Number Eleven.
Dime Dialogues Number Twelve.
Dime Dialogues Number Thirteen.
Dime Dialogues Number Fourteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Sixteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Seventeen.

Dime Dialogues Number Seventeen.

Dime Dialogues Number Eighteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Eighteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Twenty.
Dime Dialogues Number Twenty.
Dime Dialogues Number Twenty-one.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERIES.

1-DIME GENTS' LETTER-WRITER-Embracing Forms, Models, Suggestion, and Rules for the use of all classes, on all occasions.

2-DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE-For Ladies and Gentlemen: being a Guide to True Gentility and Good-Breeding, and a Directory to the Usages of society.

3-DIME BOOK OF VERSES-Comprising Verses for Valentines, Mottoes, Couplets, St. Valentine Verses, Bridal and Marriage Verses, Verses of Love, etc.

4-DIME BOOK OF DREAMS-Their Romanice and Mystery; with a complete interpreting Dictionary. Compiled from the most accredited sources.

5-DIME FORTUNE-TELLER-Comprising the art of Fortune-Telling, how o

read Character, etc.
6-DIME LADIES' LETTER-WRITER-Giving the various forms of Letters of School Days, Love and Friendship, of Society, etc.

-DIME LOVERS' CASKET-A Treatise and Guide to Friendship, Love, Court-

7-DIME LOVERS' CASKET-A Treatise and Guide to Friendship, Love, Courtship and Marriage. Embracing also a complete Floral Dictionary, etc.

3-DIME BALL-FOOM COMPANION-And Guide to Dancing. Giving rules of Etiquette, hints on Private Parties, toilettes for the Ball-room, etc.

9-BOOK OF 100 CAMES-Out-door and In-door SUMMER GAMES for Tourists and Families in the Country, Picnics, etc., comprising 100 Games, Forfeits, etc.

10-DIME CHESS INSTRUCTOR-A complete hand-book of instruction, giving the entertaining mysteries of this most interesting and fascinating of games.

11-DIME BOOK ")F CROQUET-A complete guide to the game, with the latest rules, diagrams, Croquet Dictionary, Parlor Croquet, etc.

12-DIME BOOK OF BEAUTY-A delightful book, full of interesting information. It deserves a place in the hands of every one who would be beautiful.

DIME ROBINSON CRUSOE-In large octavo, double columns, illustrated.

FAMILY SERIES.

1. DIME COOK BOOK.

2. DIME RECIPE BOOK.
3. DIME HOUSEWIFE'S MANUAL.

4. DIME FAMILY PHYSICIAN.

5. DIME DRESSMAKING AND MIL-LINERY.

The above books are sold by Newsdealers everywhere, or will be sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, 10 cents each. BEADLE & ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William Street, New York.

QUINDARO;

OR,

THE HEROINE OF FORT LARAMIE.

A TALE OF THE FAR WEST.

BY LIEUT. COL. HAZELTON.

DEW YORK:

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS,

No. 98 WILLIAM STREET.

BEADLE AND COMPANY,

in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

THE ROLAND FROM ENGINEER

QUINDARO.

And an arranged to be of the second of the second of

There are leading the second

CHAPTER I.

FORT LARAMIE AND ITS HEROINE.

The sun never shone upon a spot more wildly beautiful in its variety than the plains of Laramie. To one who has never visited western Nebraska, it may appear singular that the name plains should be applied to a portion of country in the very midst of the most prominent peaks and ridges of the Rocky mountains. But, in spite of their location, the title is far from being inappropriate. Fort Laramie is situated at the junction of the north fork of the Nebraska or Platte river, and one of lesser note, bearing its own name. The Platte river, from this point to its source, describes nearly a circle, winding through the mountains for a distance of four hundred miles. Laramie river rises but a few miles from the Lad of the Platte, but, running in an almost direct course, thus quite completes the circle, forming an inclosure of about seventy-five miles in extent. Within this inclosure are the celebrated Laramis plains. It is not simply a wide-spreading prairie, but a series of valleys, varying in size, nestling at the base of lofty ridges. Through these valleys flow innumerable small streams. They appear to rise from one common center, and, diverging, empty their clear waters into the Platte or Laramie.

And the mountains here, in their grandeur, present a striking contrast to the peaceful beauty of the vales below. "Laramie Peak" is perhaps the most prominent. It is about twenty miles from the fort which bears its name. From its most elevated point, a magnificent view of the rolling prairies, stretching toward the Missouri, can be had; also, of the valley of the Platte, the river itself, and the narrow strips of woodland which, at intervals, fringe its banks.

To the westward, the view is different. Far as the eye can reach, are the ragged mountain tops, amid which are two places of interest, to which especial reference must be made. These are known as "Rock Independence," and "Devil's Gate." The former is an elevated peak, nearly barren of verdure, perhaps four thousand feet in hight. At its summit is a huge rock bearing the name indicated. It appears to have formed the termination of an immense ridge, but had become isolated, in order to give free course to the Sweetwater river, which flows through a narrow opening, bearing the suggestive title of the "Devil's Gate." Indeed, the river passes under "Independence Rock," and the name "Devil's Gate" is suggested from the surrounding gloom, the roaring waters, and the huge caverns formed in the mountain's side.

The period of which we write was the year 1857-8. At that time, Fort Kearney, about two hundred miles from the Missouri border, was the extreme western settlement. It is true that many adventuresome and daring spirits had advanced far into the interior, and many a squatter's cabin dotted the valley of the Platte, even to the base of the mountain ridges; but the intervals between these were often many miles in extent, and the country could not be called settled.

Now it is fair to suppose that the term "squatter" implies the roughest and most unlettered backwoodsman. As a general rule, this is the case. But, as there are exceptions to all rules, so there were exceptions in this case; and the plains of Nebraska could boast a few families of refinement, who had been induced by reverse of fortune, or some like repellent cause, to seek a home "far from the haunts of men," amid the sublime solitudes of those western valleys, where the buffalo and the Indian still roamed in their aboriginal freedom.

Fort Laramie, at that time, was of considerable importance, as a trading-post with the Indians, and was usually occupied by about three hundred United States troops. It was also of importance as a protection to trains destined for the Golden State, which chose the route via Platte valley, the Sweetwater, South Pass and Fort Hall.

There was, perhaps, a half-dozen cabins beyond the first link of mountains, and spread over Laramie plains at intervals varying from five to twenty miles. To one of these lonely habitations we direct the reader's attention. Though by no means remarkable in appearance it was decidedly so in situation.

It was located near the junction of the Platte and Medicine Bow rivers, and about five miles from the mouth of the Sweetwater, or fifteen from Devil's Gate. The peculiar feature connected with the cabin was, that, instead of having been erected in the valley, which was one of the most lovely in the plains, it stood about one hundred feet up the sharp mountain side, and was almost entirely concealed from view by the foliage and the ragged rocks. Indeed, the passage from the base of the mountain up to the cabin, was a thing not easily accomplished, unless by one familiar with the spot.

When the traveler, leaving civilization, penetrates the west ern wilds, he is apt to feel a sense of utter loneliness, even though accompanied by congenial companions. Before him rolls the vast prairie, or the dense forest greets his vision. The buffalo, the wild horse, the prairie-wolf, the deer and the roaming savage, become objects familiar to him, and he longs for those scenes he has so recently left.

So when Fort Laramie, with its civilization, is approached by the adventurer, after a journey of four hundred miles through the barren wastes of Nebraska, no wonder the sight is a welcome one.

Nor was the most attractive feature of the fort the presence of its officers, its soldiers and their families. There was a "heroine" present, around whom centered much of interest and romance. Her story is as follows:

Manonie, or Wild Bird, as she was called by the savages, was a "pale-face." Of her parentage, nothing was known, excepting by the chief of the Pawnees, Nemona, or "Rushing Waters." The father of Nemona had captured the girl in central Iowa, when she was but three years of age. The fate of her parents was unknown. Manonie herself was ignorant of the fact of her being of white blood, until by chance she learned it from one of the officers of Laramie, with whom she had become acquainted, and who had gleaned this much of her history from an Indian, by bribe and cajolery.

Manonie, or Wild Bird, as she was commonly called, had considerable affection for her dusky friends, for, in truth, she had been treated with especial kindness by them, or rather by the chief. There was, however, a brave called Wontum, or Wild Cat, who had sought the maid in marriage, but had been spurned. It appeared as if the proud nature of one nobly born had been suddenly aroused within her, when thus solicited; for there was such an exhibition of indignation and disgust that even Wontum slunk away in shame or fear.

Nemona, the chief, as is quite unusual with the savage, had a wife to whom he was truly attached, and cared not to take a second. He therefore attempted to use his influence with his beautiful foster-sister in favor of Wontum; but, to no purpose. Indeed, it resulted in high words and no little bitterness of feeling between the maid and the chief; and so, Manonie was left to herself. Wontum, ascertaining this fact, lost no opportunity to urge his sait, and also to use threats, to all of which the maiden returned her first scornful reply.

However, from that moment she began to absent herself much from the Indian villages; while, from her excessive caution when she found herself liable to encounter her persecutor, she received the title of "Wild Bird." The maiden was, at that time, about fifteen years of age. During the year following the proposal and rejection, she often visited the few white settlers then residing on the plains. Her distaste for the savage life appeared to grow upon her; her "white" instincts began to assert themselves.

At length she met a young lieutenant from the fort, who had heard her story, or a portion of it, from the settlers. He became her willing tutor. She was a ready pupil. At first he felt an interest, then a sympathy, and, finally, found himself deeply in love. Nor was it a hopeless passion, for it was returned with all the ardor of an impulsive soul. The young man discovered in the beautiful girl a nature of singular purity, an intellect of remarkable quickness, and a grace as exquisite as if the dancing waters had been her tutor. It would have been strange if Henry Marshall, a lieutenant in the United States army, of proud family and independent spirit, had not loved the unknown forest-maiden, for few hearts could have passed the ordeal of her eyes and tongue and not have dreamed of Houris and their enchantments.

The engagement between the lovers soon became known throughout the tribe, and a bitter feeling was engendered in consequence. The chief, it is true, gave little heed to the matter, but Wontum declared at once for a savage vengeance.

Influential with the tribe, a large number consented to join him in any thing he might attempt, to secure his prize and to thwart the proud pale-face. The maiden was, soon thereafter, made a prisoner in the village, but succeeded in escaping, and reached the fort in safety.

Chagrined and furious at the girl's desertion of her tribe, Wontum formed a plan for her recapture. He attacked a train at "South Pass," but, instead of killing the emigrants, he made them prisoners. By design, however, he let one of the party escape, who made his way directly to Laramie, with the intelligence of the attack and capture. This was as the wily savage designed—his purpose being to draw as many of the troops away from the fort as possible, in his pursuit, thus to leave it weak enough for the consummation of his further diabolical strategy.

He conveyed his plunder and prisoners to the very summit of "Table Hill," which adjoins the Pass. This is, perhaps, one of the most formidable peaks of the Rocky ranges. It is very steep, ragged, thickly timbered, and is seven thousand four hundred and eighty-eight feet in hight—a truly formidable landmark even among its rugged brothers.

It was not the purpose of Wontum to remain at Table Hill with his entire force, which consisted of about two hundred warriors. He left, at the hill, about twenty of his painted cutthroats, and, with the remainder, set out for the fort, which he intended to surprise, and, after having destroyed the garrison, to seize Manonie and make his escape.

The distance from South Pass to Laramie was nearly two hundred miles. Perhaps half the distance had been passed, when the savages saw the approaching troops. They concealed themselves until all danger of an encounter was over, and then pressed rapidly forward. The strategist's plans appeared to work well.

There had been left at the fort a force of about forty men-Lieutenant Henry Marshall being in command. The marriage ceremony with his forest-queen had not yet taken place, although Manonie remained within the post—a guest and pupil of the officers' ladies. The attack upon the emigrants convinced her that Wontum was on the war-path, and her forest instincts at once were on the alert. What was the ultimate design of the chief? She feared even for her safety in the fort, and conceived that the attack had in it some design on her and her now very dear friends. Silently she withdrew from the fortification, and at once passed off into the valley above. determined to watch, with her keen eye, for any sign of coming disaster. All day long was she absent, until Marshall became exceedingly uneasy at her stay. Just as darkness settled over all, her light form came into view from the sallyport, and she was admitted, evidently weary from a long day's, journey. She had seen sufficient to convince her that a large party of savages were approaching, and the little garrison at once made preparation for a defense.

The assault was made at midnight, and the savages, not anticipating so warm a reception, fell back in disorder. A regular siege was then commenced, and all the arts and devices known to those tigers of the plains, were employed by Wontum, to carry out his scheme of murder and seizure. The third day of the siege arrived. Lieutenant Marshall had been wounded, and the men, weary with watching, and left without a commander, gave evidence of yielding.

It was about midnight of the third day, that the Indians made a most desperate charge. They were received with less determination than before. Encouraged by this, several of the most daring, led by Wontum, sprung within the inclosure. Manonie was then seated beside the bed of her wounded lover, but at this crisis she sprung forward, and, seizing a sword, fought with the fury of desperation, while she called upon those around to imitate her example. The result was that the savages were again repulsed with fearful loss, for, inspired by her astonishing bravery, the troops, with a wild huzza, rushed into the hand-to-hand conflict, and the fort was saved.

Wontum, finding it impossible to secure the maid, surrounded as she was by the soldiers, sought out Marshall. His bloody knife gleamed in the dim light, and was about to become warm with the blood of the wounded man, when Manonie appeared and leveled a terrible blow at the head of the savage. Her aim, in consequence of her intense excitement, was not altogether true, but the sharp steel fell upon the uplifted arm, and Wontum, with a yell of pain and rage, sprung from the room and made his escape. The siege was ended.

ss the troops returned the following morning, and the savage retired to his mountain lairs to await another opportunity for striking the fatal blow.

So Manonie, the Wild Bird, became the "herome of Port Laramie." And shortly after there was a marriage celebration, and the fore t-benuty became the happy wide of Henry Mushali. Then a year passed—a dear, delich as year, so fall of sweets and wild delicies as to make earth a paralles—and the large and another. Another, and another rolled around, at I little Harry Marshall became the pet of the first.

The "heroine" was not forcat in. Her inna had spread for across the prairies, and when the traveler arrived at that outpust of civilization, almost the first in party was for its brave and beautiful defender.

Every effort had been ander to ascertain the per proper of the now wife and mether, but without success. Mony fallers, whose little ones but been stolen from them years before, visited the fort, but faired to recognize any feature, or fact, which could identify her as their own. As for herself, the recollection of her early home dawnel slowly but indistinctly upon her. One by one, incidents and acts of her early life came back to her; seems and forms took shape, until, out of that mist of distance, her childhood's home arose clearly and distinctly, and she declared that she would be able to recognize her figher if she should meet him, unless, indeed, he had changed very much since her infiney. With her advance in education and refinement, her desire to ascert in the secret of her birth, and to find her parents, became daily greater. Not that she was unquiet or over-enter in her truly blissful wile's estate; but, the affection which hely nature has implanted in our hairs for the authors of our being, weded up in her one, and day and night, her prayer went up for the lost but loved ones who knew her not.

At the time our story opens, Licutenant Marshall and his water as Mar Post Lorenie, although they were about to take their beature for Lorenworth. They had been three years their by all the Harry, their only-born, the i belof his parents, and of all the troops stationed at Laramie, was two years of age.

CHAPTER II.

OLD JOHN.

WE referred to the cabin situated at the junction of the Platte and Medicine Bow rivers, up the hill-side, so hid in away, like some eagle's nest, that even the lynx-eye of the savage might not detect it.

It was scarcely light, on the morning of the 20th of September, in the year 1857. A young man, mounted upon a splendid animal, approached the base of the hill, or rather ledge, where stood the lonely cabin. He had been attracted toward the spot by the smoke which curled up among the trees. He soon found it impossible to proceed, on account of the broken rocks, and, dismounting, bent his course upward. As he clambered along, he exclaimed:

"This hermit must possess a taste decidedly romantic, or he never would have selected such a spot for his dwelling. If name is not quite romantic enough for the lead of his cabin. Old John is commonplace, surely. Yet he is a strange man. I can learn nothing about him of the settlers upon the plains." These words were spoken as if a tedres-ed to some companion, although none was near.

The speaker had reached a little open space, upon which the cabin stood, as this self-colloquy was ended.

by his side. The young man gazed upon the speaker water some degree of interest not ununingly I with astords interest. It was a man of powerful frame. His eyes were suchen adjust concealed beneath the shaggy frows, while the line white locks of heir hung of at his should restrict the with His begree with any of the same has a primary with this point with other porteons of his " tope." His make was not maken a with method by. The young man did not reply for several moments of man, observing his sitemee he so reely realized himself. The of man, observing his hesitation, said:

- You left too fine an animal at the foot of the ledge. Did you want it to fall into the hands of the legges?"
  - "I don't understand you."
  - "Oh!--legyos?--you don't know its meaning?"
- "No. It is a name or title which I have never before heard; nor do I understand its significance. But I confess I wild not like any mistortune to betall Dahlyren."
- "On yes; I see. That is the name of your horse. Well, here he is." The young man turned, and saw his steed feeding, in a quiet manner, between two huge rocks, which formed a perfect shelter. He sprung forward, and, ascertaining that it was indeed his own beast, asked:
- "How did you bring him so quickly to this point? It can not be more than twenty minutes since I left him securely fastened to a tree below."
- "Yes. And in five minutes after you left him, he would have been in the hands of the legyos."
  - "The legyos again."
- "Yes It is the Indian name for as assin-for midnight murderers."
  - " And they would have seized my horse?"
  - "Yes. Did you expect less?"
- "Not if any of the savares were near me. But, I thought my journey across the valley was unobserved by them."
  - "You must pardon me, young man, but you are a fool."
- "Yeu must pardon me, sir. But I am not accustomed to be addressed by such a title, nor will I permit it."
  - "You prefer to do as you please, I suppose?"
- "Not so, sir. If I can deem you my friend, I will take your advice. Still I confess I do not accept the title you gave me."
- "Well, then, I ask your pardon. But you know old ago
- "You have done me a favor, sir; and, therefore, you may claim a free pardon."
- "Why are you here alone?" asked the old man, as he fixed his gaze upon his visitor. "It is not safe for a person to travel singly through these valleys, more especially if he is well mounted and wears the uniform of the United States army."

"It is not my choice. I have—pardon me sir; but are you not the person known as John, the hermit?"

The old man bowed his head, and, for some time, remained silent. There was a slight tremor visible, and a half- a prosed moun. The young man gazed upon the hermit with an interest not unmingled with sympathy. He felt that some leavy grief must be his or he never would have thus isold tell himgelt from mankind. But what that grief micht be the per ' officer had not the slightest intimation, and he consider " refrained from asking any questions lest it might be the chis of opening afresh some terrible wound. He had heard much of Old John, the hermit, as a strange but peaceable man, who was feared by the savages-a fear caused by supervition. They believed him possessed of supernatural powers, and never approached nearer his cabin than the base of the chif. It could scarcely be that his sorrow was the result of any savage harbarity, as he had never been known to interfere, in the slightest manner, with any of the red-men. More than this, some of the settlers in the valley declared that the sold in was decidedly pious, as he had often been found praying when they had visited him. But such visits were rare. It had, therefore, been decided, that his grief must have some connection with his former life, and that he had voluntarily exiled himself from seenes where he could no longer be happy.

At length the old man raised his head, and, to the question replied:

Yes. I am the old hermit, as I am usually call d by those who know little of me. Still, I am not a hermit, or recluse, as you infer."

The young man gazed around expecting to see others who were sharing that solitude. The old man observed this, and continued:

"No wife or children greet me here, I grant you. And yet, I am not alone. Gaze around you. What do you so ?"

"Very little but gloom. True, there is a valley below; and it has much claim to natural beauty; but, then, it is so monotonous—ever the same. And that river alliters in the merning sun; but its brightness wearies the eye at length, and it never changes."

" No. It is like its Creator - it never changes. Well it is that it is ever the same. You are find of change. Look upon me. I was once young as yourself; but I have changed. And my life has changed more than my person. You are happy now. Do you wish change to come to you, and bring you misery? Oh, beware how you become discontented with blessings the Almighty has encircled you with. Listen to the warbling of these birds. They are always happy, and they change not. Listen to that gushing rill. Its music never couses. Look at the silver of that water-spring. See how the billing liquid is rolling up from the bright sands at its bottom. I have quenched my thirst there a thousand times. And it has not changed for six long years. Should you wish for change in that? Oh, may the day never come to you, that you will pray for things as they were and not as they are."

"You are painting a very gloomy picture for a young life. That is, you are supposing if change comes it must be for the worse. May it not, in some instances, be for the better? We will take your own case, for example. Could nothing occur to render you happier than you are?"

"Yes; I think so. Do you recollect the last remarkable words which were spoken by the dying Buron Humboldt?"

"I can not say that I do."

- "I will tell you. The good old man was closing up a life of usefulnes. Through the closed blinds of his room a suntay stole and danced upon the ceiling. He gazed upon it a moment, and then exclaimed:
  - " 'Oh! how beautiful! Oh! how beautiful!"
- "He had seen that sunbeam ten thousand times, and had never longed for a change in it. It was as lovely to him as it ever had been. But now the time for change had come for him and that sunbeam, and he continued:

" Oh! how beautiful! It seems to becken earth to heaven!"

"And so, young man, when the change comes for me, it will be a welcome one. But you did not tell me how you came to be here alone, and who you are, although I suppose you came from the fort."

"I am Lieutenant Henry Marshall."

"Ah, yes! I remember having seen you as you passed up at that time, that I did not recognize you at once to-day Where are your men?"

- "Not one of them lives."
- " Indeed !"
- "Yes; we were surprised, near the South Pass, by a party of savages, and I alone escaped, to bear the sad tilings to the fort. It was a sad work, sir—a and work!" and the young officer sighed heavily over his lost companions.
  - "What tribe did the attacking party belong to?"
- "I do not know. I should judge they were the Pawnees. Wontum, one of their braves, has sworn to take my life, and, if possible, to capture my wife and child. But I did not see him with the savages who assailed us, though he may have been their director."
- "No. He passed down the valley, toward Laramie, three days since."
- "Is it possible! Was he alone?" asked Marshall, with some excitement.
- "No. His warrions were with him—all in war-paint, and athirst for blood."
  - " How large a number ?"
  - " Not less than three hundred."
- "And in war-paint, too," he mused. "Are you sure Woutum led them in person?"
- "I can not answer positively, as the distance between us was so great. But they were in war-costume, and, for saveral reasons, I believe them to have been Wontum's band."

Marshall sighed heavily, and grew pale; but quickly the blood mounted to his face, as he pressed his hands to his brow. The old man observing this, asked:

- "Do you believe they really intend to attack the fort?"
- "Yes; and I tremble for the consequences. The garrieon is not strong."
- "But will no doubt be able to defend it. If I am not mistaken, your fears are more directly connected with the settlers than the soldiers."
- "I don't know that I have any especial fears with regard to either. But when I am absent, of late, there is a weight upon my heart which I can not explain. I do believe that I have become a coward on account of my wife and chall?"

" Are they not safe in the fort?"

"Yes: I believe they are secure there. It is not because my judgment tells me that they are in any danger, but a precentiment oppresses me. If harm should come to them, it would kill me."

"Guard them well, young man. They are treasures that, excelost, can never be regained," added the old man fervently, a tear trembled upon his eyelid.

"Ay, guard them well I will. I must be away at once a came here for concealment while my poor animal gained a attle rest. But every moment is precious."

"There is great danger between this place and the fort.

The valley is full of the bloodthirsty wretches."

"Still I must venture the journey. Were the path infested every rod with rattlesnakes, I should press on."

"That is nobly spoken. I honor your devotion. But you must not-shall not, go alone."

- "Who will go with me? Who would share such peril?"
- "I will."
- "What! Leave your fastness here where you are so secure in your isolation?"
- "I am not so much of a solitaire as you suppose. I devote much of my time to assisting the unfortunate wayfarer and settler. You must not pass through the valley. I will be your guile over the mountains, as that is the only feasible route now."
- "And I'll go along, as sure as my name's Jack Oakley," a lied a speaker, who came up at that moment. The hermit extending his hand in welcome to the new-corner asked:
  - "Do you bring any thing of importance?"
  - " Wal, rather 'portant to me."
  - "What is it?" asked old John.
- and the off weren. What to be but by here a bit"
- "The there used be seen trouble it you been your family been."
- "I knew they would be. And they'll be all safe here, for the layor would as soon think of facin' Old Nick in his own regions, as coming up here."

The parties spoken of made their appearance, and entered the cabin—two females and a babe.

"Have you any special news?" asked the hermit.

"Nothin' further than that about two hundred of the redskins have gone down the Platte, and that lets on 'an are sneakin' about. I think our best way is to go straight across the mountains, and down the Laramie river. That's the 'clearest way, I reck'n, jist now, and, shouldn't wender a bit ef we come across some of the villains, even in the hills."

The preparations were soon made, and the party, consisting of Marshall, old John, and Oakley, set out for the fort. Of course, Dahlgren the horse, was not left behind.

CHAPTER III.

WONTUM AND HIS VICTIMS.

THE savages had received a severe punishment for their attack upon the fort and the train. The lesson was a whelesome one, and, for the three years after the marriage of Lieutenant Marshall and Manonie, the Pawnees had committed very few depredations. Most of these which were committed resulted from the direct influence of Wontum, where savage hatred of the whites abated not, but rather grew in intensity—especially toward the man who had won the heart of the beautiful "Wild Bird." How to glut his fiendish pas sion for revenge became his sole study. All the brute instinct of his nature was aroused. His heart was on fire with fever for the moment when he could strike. How to strike and give the worst pain was his frequent subject of mellitation To slay was but an ordinary expression of hate. A scrip lock more or less did not matter. To agonize, to torture, was his only purpose. Such a creature is the American Inlian when once his true nature is permitted full sway. All the fables of ancient ferocity are shown in the reality of bis life when the hatchet is dury up and the war-palet is on. Christian sentiments by upon his mind only as leaves to be blown away by the first tempest. The "civilized" Pawnee, or Sioux, or Crow, is just as much civilized as one of Herr Driesbach's tigers—no more. The thirst for blood never dies. His Indian nature may be modified by the momentary influences of fear, whisky or want, but give him his own wilds and the hyana is not more cruel—the wolf not more heartless. This is the American aborigine as he is by nature and instinct—as he will ever be so long as he is an Indian. When the Apathe is taked, or the Comanche is brought under control, the Rocky mountains will have disappeared, and the Valley of Delights will have taken their place.

To give most pain, Wontum had resolved to get possession of Marshall's child, for that would also give him possession of Manonie, who, he well knew, would not hesitate to follow after her offspring—were it even to walk the burning path to the stake. To this end, he commenced depredations in various directions, intending to create a bitter feeling between the sol liers and his tribe, and thus bring on a general war, which the old chief had endeavored to avoid. The bronze-hearted villain had committed a number of murders, which he represented as having been done by the pale-faces, taking care that the victums should belong to the Pawnees, or to some friendly neighboring tribe.

At length Nemona, the head chief, aggravated by these repeated murders, gave his consent for the commencement of hostilities—so successfully had Wontum maneuvered. The savages took possession of "Devil's Gate," fortifying themselves upon the rocks adjoining. Their position was a strong one. The first attack was made as usual upon a train. This drew from the fort a small body of men, every one of whom was killed or captured with the exception of Marshall, whom, in the last chapter, we found with the hermit upon his return from the fatal expedition.

Aper this attack, Wontum made a rapid movement down the Plat'e, and arrived in the vicinity of the fort long before he result of Marshall's expedition had become known. This was as he wished, as he had resolved to employ stratagem to effect his chief purpose of securing the child and mother. He concealed his warriors in a dense thicket only a short distance from the fort, and under 'he darkness of a stormy right, advanced for the purpose of reconnoitering the works. He was without his war-dress or paint.

It was not supposed at Fort Laramie that any thing like a general war was intended; nor was there the nest remote idea that the fort would be attacked. The guard, therefore, was not as vigilant as in more dangerous times.

Wontum found little difficulty in reaching the outer work, but now the greatest obstacle presented itself. It was after brelze o'clock, and the very presence of an Indian, at such an hour of the night, would create suspicion at any time. But now that there were rumors of depredations by the Pawnes, if it should be discovered that one of their number, and that one a brave, was lurking around at such an hour, he would certainly be arrested, and perhaps executed as a spy and marauder. He therefore advanced with extreme castion, until the entrance of the fort was reached. The hage deed was closed. Beside it stood a sentinel leaning lazily against the wall, his gun resting by his side. While considering how to act, the door or gate swung back with a heavy sound, and the relief-guard made its appearance. The drowsy's attinct sprung up, and advanced to neet his comrades.

Wontum took advantage of the mementary engagement of the sol liers, and of the heavy darkness, to glide through the open gate. Then he found himself within the courted inclosure, but upon strange ground. He had been within the fort but once before, and to gain some knowledge of its intrior was of much importance to him. Of course he could not know the location of the different sentry-poots, and to move around, no matter with how much caution, involved no small amount of danger. But, that master-passion of his soil, revenge, was stronger than his fear, and he resolved to adored or die."

He heard the massive door reclose, and then the treat of the sentry as they returned to their given the treat the land knowledge of compeller, but his natural is the two and interest to teach him that, as in the Indian viller, the later of a of buildings would be assimed the offers higher Indian Refere him were a long row of white buildings or harrows, and to the right, at the other entrance, were others, which, from their appearance, he judged to be those he sought. To reach them he would be compelled to cross an open space; but the darkness was so intende, that there would be little danger of detection, if great caution was used.

In the buildings which he intended reaching, there gienn l a faint light in one of the lower win lows, and quite a armi r In those of the second story. Hhewhere all was dark; tot a zoon I broke the stillness of the night, save the pattering of ile rain upon the hard-packed walls, and the moening of the wind. All were at rest, with the exception of those whose duty it was to watch, unless it might be those who were occurpying the lighted rooms. And if there was a sleepless eye or Eching heart within those walls, why should it not be Manonie, the Wild Bird? Her husband was absent, but not her protectors; for here were those who would have fought in her detense, even unto death. How well he noticed this his silent movements gave evidence. A sha low could not have been more neiseless, nor a serpent more alert. He glidel acress the open space, croaching close to the ground, ever and anon pausing to listen, and to mark his course. But his progress was uninterrupted, and, at length, he reached the will buil ling. Then he crept close to a window from which ; am la de ble light. But a thick curtain prevented him se ing what was taking place within. He placed his ear near the glass, and listered. There was no sound to be heard. He tage I lightly upon the pane, an I still all was silent.

"Sleep," he muttered. "This was captain's room long time ago when hurt. Must find if he his room now."

He replated his blows upon the window; this time with more viger. In a moment he heard a movement within. He spring back and prestrated himself closely upon the ground.

Although it was only the month of September, and the Lys were as warm as mileummer, yet the nights were cool, and, as it was storming, this one was especially unpleasant. The win lows of the building were closed in consequence. But the one at which the savage had stationed himself, was now thrown open, and the immate of the room peered forth rate the surrounding places. It was difficult to determine whether the form was that of a male or female.

At the man moment another window directly over this we, and from which streamed a bright light, was also thrown up, and a form appeared which was easily recognized as that of a female. Apparently addressing herself to the person below, she asked:

"Did you not hear an unusual somel, Lieutenant Blair?"

"I did, Manonie. Did you observe any thing especial?"

"I did. I have not slept, and I have listened attentively, that I might hear the approach of my husband, should he arrive to-night. And I am sure I distinctly heard some person, or some thing, tapping upon your window."

"I think we were both deceived. It must have been the rain, or the rattle of the sash by the wind."

"I think not. I have listened to every sound, and this one only lasted for an instant; and during the whole night it was the only one like it. I should not be at all surprised if there were Indians lurking around."

"Oh, no, Manonie. You are nervous to-night on account of the absence of your husband. It would be impossible for a savage to enter the fort without being discovered. You had better retire. This constant watching will be too much for you."

"It would be useless, for I could not rest. Besides, my little Harry has been wakeful and feverish all the earlier part of the night. But he is sleeping now."

"Probably only the natural anxiety of a mother causes you to fancy this. Come, retire now, and think no more of this. And if the noise is again repeated, I will go for a guard and have a thorough search made."

"You have not heard any thing from my husband and our friends yet, have you?"

"Not yet. But I have no fears for their safety."

"I have. What I have observed for the past few days has fed me to believe that the savages mean mischief. I have seen a number of them lurking around, and I think their presence bodes no good. And I think my husband was accompanied by too few of our men."

"But we have sent another hundred. We shall probably learn of their safety by to-morrow."

" God grant it. Good-night." Manonie closed her window.

Lieutenant Blair remained a moment more gazing into the darkness, and then dropping the sash, retired. The savage win low, could be seen a truly demoniac expression which lit up his face like a fire from within. His prey was within his grosp! If had I arned that the husband of Manonie still was absent, and had discovered the room she occupied. He kn with garrison of the fort had been weakened by the absence of one hundred men, besides the party which had been in its minimately shughtered a few days before, at "Devil's Get." The present number of soldiers could not, then, exceed a hundred. If they could be thoroughly surprised, a victory could be gained! The delighted monster with difficulty restrained the wild whorp of satisfaction which trembled upon his lips.

His thest impulse was to return to his warriors, and then make the attack. But he was satisfied that daylight would come before he could get every thing in readiness; and to most the garrison well prepared for defense, would be to run a very great chance of another defeat. But, over and above all, he filt a malicious desire to accomplish alone the revenge which his heart had been so long set upon. In an instant he had determined upon his plans. Blair had said that if he heart the noise again, he would go for a guard.

The savage again approached the win low, and tapped fightly. It was not his purpose to have Manonic hear. This done, he again sprung back. The sash was again thrown up, and Blair called to know who was there. Of rouse no answer came. The lieutenant then crossed his recreating footsteps, and, quick as thought, he sprung through the open window into the vacant room. This done, he concert i him if beneath the bed. Hearing the lieutenant giving threations for a thorough search, he grinned in his devilish give at the success of his ruse.

It was but a short time before the officer returned to his tom, and, scating himself by his table, began the perusal of two papers. An hour passed, and a corporal entered and including the fact that a thorough search had been made, but to had unusual had been found. The officer then closed his win low and retired to his couch for sleep.

Another hour passed and the heavy breathing of Blau convinced the savage that he was sleeping. Cautiously at crawled forth, and, scating himself by the beliefe, gozed upon his intended and unconscious victim. He drew from his left a long, sharp knife, and toyed with its point, as if he wided to lengthen, as for as possible, the joy he filt at having the nated foe thus in his power. He arose to his feet and best ever the sleeper. He raised the knife. It glitted in the fight: and then he lowered it again. Was it some got larged that held his arm? And was it this which cannot the fated men to smile in his sleep? Perhaps it was that his soul was about to be transferred from a world of strife to these bright realms where revenge and hate were words unknown. Linguistenant Blair was truly a Christian soldier, beloved by all with whom he was associated.

At length the sleeper opened his eyes. He attempted to rise, but he felt the sharp point of the knife at his heart.

- " No speak loud!" exclaimed the savage.
- "What would you?" asked the lieutenant.
- "Me kill you-quick-there!"

Poor Blair closed his eyes—groaned—the work was done. The monster greed upon the dead man, and, for several moments, remained motionless. At length he timed and walked to the door. He opened it and people into the hall. A dim light was burning, but all was silent. He stoped cautiously forth, and walked along the people. It was not long before he found the steps halling to the second 2 m. These he a cended, pausing before the door of the squartment which was occupied by the mother and child. He list to be not a sound was heard. But through a crowice he could see that a light still was burning. He to theel the latch, but found the loor fast. Here was a dilemma. What was to be done? If he attempted to force it, she would be around even if she was then askeep, and would give the alarm.

Stan sometimes appears to as ist his own in a wenderful manner, when they are engaged in doing his work. So it appeared on this occasion.

At this moment the heavy tread of the "reunls" was heard below. Wontum listened. He also he ril a novement within Manonie's apartment, and had hardly time to conceal himself behind the rubbish in the end of the hall, when who made her appearance. Tripping lightly toward the top of the stairs, she exclaimed, as if speaking her thoughts:

and listen d. Wills their engaged, the savage passed unseen into a random. He secreted him elf readily behind the heavy curvies which drop dethe window, and awaited her return

Will shower is dabs on the savage had an opportunity of serve, in the rapertment. It would have been considered a leave been considered a leave by the serious aniel the surroundings of fashion. Upon a call was reposing the child, little Harry Marshall. This was the sen of her he once had loved, with a kind of barbein person. The son! It was the instrument of his design upon rather and mother! Again the fiend sat upon his her nearly to sere an its delight, but the monster forced the her nearly to sere an its delight, but the monster forced the her nearly to sere an its delight, but the monster forced the her nearly to sere an its delight, but the monster forced the her her belief becaute to bide its time, when it should make the bills echo with its terrible joy.

He had not long to wait. The mother appeared. It was the first time Wontenn had seen Manonie for three years; and has not without some emotion on his part, something very a lib mexicle had by the savage. As he gazed upon her his

i. . _rew as black as night, and he clutched his knife.

The mether approached the bed and bent over her chill. It was sleeping calmly.

"It must have been my imagination," she exclaimed, "for my durling exhibits no farther symptoms of pain. Oh, if I st. It lose kim! But I am weary. Lieutenant Blair said that I must rest, or I should injure my health; so I must retire and sleep. It is strange. When I lived in the mountains I was never weary, and could keep the track, or drive my canon ni ht and day. But now that I have become accestomed to lighty, I tire so soon. Then my mind was free. Now, if my der les abilit absent from me only for an hour, I see before The based death, and terror is ever present with me. In tion in a till, mail her a later to the tract Oh, more it were the telliber will be but the thirt of lowing Vi. Il. we fi mil! I wonder if my own parents loved me 33 I live my boy? I shall never see them, for they are deal. I rester could survive his loss. Well, I will rest be-.ide him." The mother huelt by the bedside. She raised her clasped hands to heaven, and her lips moved in humble, penitential, thankful prayer. Then she arose from her knees, pressed her little one's hand gently to her lips, and had her self by its side. How the good angels must have flattered their pinions in pain, and longed to breathe into her can the words "fly—fly!" Alas! the angels were in another world, as far removed from the mother and child as life is removed from death; and yet they were very near!

Overcome with watching, she slept.

The Evil One crept from his hiding-place and approached the bed, clasping his knife, ready for immediate use, should it be required. Carefully he raised the child in his arms—so carefully that he did not disturb the mother or the little sieger. Softly the Evil One opened the door and passed into the Lall, down the stairs and into the apartment of the number of the little tenant. Then he raised the window, and was surprised to find that daylight was dawning. The Evil One forsth Unit, and so did Wontum. The Evil One and himself were contact that night. In passing through it, the little fellow awoke, with beholding himself in the arms of such a monster, he sate particle a wild cry. It was echoed and recelect from the monitor of the mineral moments the entire garrison was aroused.

The Pawnee heard the cries of the mother, who in the awakened by the screams of her chird. No time was to be lost. He therefore dashed boldly forward across the compact toward the outer wall. So unexpected was so in event, and the guard so unprepared, that, before the pure it had fairly been commenced, the Indian actually had not be the outer wall. A dozen muskets were leveled, but no not red fire, lest they should injure the child.

Leaping from the wall, the red monster ran like a discrete or take Laramie river. Into its waters be plunged, the leaves lay for the opposite shore. The parameter had a market window just in that to seeker had at likely or that a moment her strength failed, and show a halphase; in the case a brief moment. In a second of time in the wealth was needed as and put on her strength water the highest the large all things. The Woman because the highest line in the

Her cries were stilled and her sobs were smothered A game gleame I in her eyes almost supernatural. It was not the fire of anches, but the great light of love and devotion which burns upon every true mother's altar. With a bound the spring through the window. It was a fearful plunge, but she Eliter that in the least injured. With her hair streaming in the breeze, she darted for the spot where she had last seed Ler by. Those who feared for her own life, and knowing in. I. r own efforts could avail nothing, attempted to interrapt in r. but in vain. She almost flew over the turf of the parade, and quickly reached the wall, dashed over it, and on into the river-en into the belt of timber beyond-disappearing like a moteor, in the gloomy depths of the jungle.

A trief examination resulted in finding the murdered lieutrant: but how it had all been done, no one could conjectire. A strong force at once left the fort in hot pursuit. This was unfortunate. They were attacked, and the slaughter becume terrible. The savages were victorious, and Laramie, for the first time, fell into their hands. It soon became a mass of sm ding rains, and none lived to tell the tale of its fall, save those who had been fortunate enough to escape, early in the contest, to the adjoining mountains.

CHAPTER IV.

A MOUNTAIN ADVENTURE -QUENDARO.

Ir was not an easy matter for Lieutenant Marshall and Li new-Bennel friends to make their way among the rocks, tre # at I thick undergrowth which it became necessary to encounter as the vejourneved along the mountain ridges. Marshall became in; in, and, had it not been for the restraint of his com-I dan he would have taken the valley, regardless of the G. r h: might have there encountered.

Natat came or and they paused for rest. And much they Beech lit; for the way was indeed a wear, one. After the evening meal of dried meats had been partaken of the party the savages and the extent of the damage they would be likely to do before a sufficient force of the United States troops could be brought against, to crush them. Oakley was of opinion that the affair would end in smoke, while the hermit shock his head dubiously. Of course, Marshall hat all confidence in the soldiery, but, he acknowledged, his present acknowledged him in a distressing manner.

"If we could only jest lay our paws on that catamount as calls himself the leader, we'd either make him stop the row, or we'd fix his flint for him, by the stockin's!"

- "What do you mean by that term?" asked Marshall of Oakley.
- "What? Fixin' his flint?"
- "Yes."
- "Why, polishin' the critter off—makin' him hamp! Givin' him 'old anadred,' oney makin' the tune partikler meter, with lots of bars and staves chucked in to fill up kin ler."
- "Well, I think I understand you. But, to whom do you refer as the 'catamount?"
  - "Wal, I reck'n it's Nemona, the Pawase chief."
- "I think," added the hermit, "that Wontum has really more influence with the tribe than the chief himself. Near appears like a civilly disposed person; but the other is the dehirsty and relentless."
- "That's just as true as gospel preachin'. I tell you if 'twan't far just one chap what lives down in that are valley, you'd a' seen that red-skinnel varmint beein' a swath clean through them few cabins as you see sprintfel around. But even Wontom is fraiderer of him than all the sar, ints on Rattlesnake Ridge."
  - "To whom do you refer?" a-ked Marshall.
- "Wal, cap'n, that's a tough question to answer. The amount of it is, nobody round these digrain's, unless it's my grd Molly, knows any thing about him. And if she does, she won't tell. Queer critters these gals is, to be sure."
- "What do you call him?' asked Marshall, his interest visibly excited.
- "Wal, it's some outlandish name as almost breaks my jaw whenever I speak it. Molly calls him Quindaro."

"How happens it that your daughter is acquainted with the stranger and not yourself?" asked John.

"Wal, ye see, John, I'm not much given to interferin' in the women folkses' matters; an' as Molly is a dootiful gal, I didn't press the subject. 'Cos I sed to myself: 'Jack, may-hap they be loveyers,' an' when I was a-courtin' the old woman, I didn't want nobody else to come rootin' around—n to bit of it. Ef I war' goin' to court, I wa'r, an' didn't intent that anybody should interfere in that operation."

"How do you know that the intentions of this strange man are honorable toward your child?"

"Father John," exclumed Oakley, as he started to his feet, "I'm down right surprised to hear you ask such a question. How de I know he means well towards my gal? I'll tell you Law by askin' you a few questions. Don't you remember one dirk night, about six years ago -- Molly was a little gal then -that the rels came upon us an' began their cuttin's up; an' when I interfered, as I was in duty bound to do, and the knife of a savage was just at my throat, an' I thought it was all day with all Jack Oakley, that this man rushed in, an' catchin' the rel by the neck, he pitched him clean through the winder? An' that warn't all. He went in like as he was goin' boat a " I's work. Lord, but 'twas a purty sight! I warn't no ware, and I do consider myself some on a bear-hug. An' when he got through, and the reds had all taken to their heels like mad, he just took Molly up in his arms, kissed her just ence, exact her his darling, and then vanished like a streck, without waitin' to tell us who he was, or givin' me a chance to thank him."

"I remember you having informed me of this before," re-

"Wal, and that wasn't the first time by a jug full, nor the last of older, that he has seed the soft reson the plains to a few and there is danger."

What I can been of his character, I do not think he is the person to devive an income tagirl."

"Not by a long sight, cap'n. I tell you what it is, I trus my gal. An' I think that's the way to do. Why, sir, who

I lived lown to St. Jo, we used to have lots of nabers. Me an' the old woman was just spliced then. Ye see, I alers said I'd marry a gal as I would love, and if I found that, I could trust her. I thought that was about as good an' evidence as I could have that I loved her. But I alers said that I wasn't goin' to court very long before gettin' spliced, an' I shook l'hinde, watch an' see what the gal's father and mother thought of her an' take my 'pinion somethin' from that. So, when I went to see a gar, if I found that the old woman was watchin' an' literia' un pobbin' in and out the room every few seconds, or a ". lin' the little boy in, or all such tricks, I used to say to messile: 'Jack, that's enough for you. The mother harm the grid into ter than you do, and if she can't trest her, why she all par?" An' when I did get married, an' had a damater, I just said to myself: 'now, Jack, look out that you don't faveit your little gal by onjust suspicions; 'cos if you do, you needn't be surprised if other folks in-uit her too.' No, sir; while I have centidence in my own child, I never expect to tell strap, ers. by my actions, hat I have not. An' I know Melly is a .-- I gal. I kinder reckon she don't know any thing about Q in daro, more then be's a kind o' hunter. But, if the and don't tell her parents, ..'; because it's his secret, and it will ... ome out right sur - ____7."

"You are rig -, Mr. Oakley," replied Marshall. "I have your judgment"

"Call the Jack, if you please. Noboly hereal in herews

"Well, Jack, you are right in the course you pursue. It is my opinion that Quindaro has some sufficient remain for his singular reserve; and that he would not be takely to inflict wrong or bring distrace upon others, I can well consider has, I believe, a special spite against the same res."

"I hardly think that spite is the term vai hishard be used in connection with him. He has never her honored to molest a slagle in lice, or even a party, a they were proved in It is only when they are bent upon the chief that he makes his appearance; and sometimes in an anacountable manner."

"Have you ever seen him" asked Marshall of old John.

"I think I met him on one occasion," replied the hermit.

"Describe his appearance, if you please."

"I am not sure that I can do so. Oakley can do it, as he has met him more frequently."

"Never clap'd my eyes upon him mere than half-a-dozen times. But I've measured him about the same as I measure a prairie-hen upon the wing."

" Well."

Wal, he's about as tall as they get up men about these parts, an' he ain't no bean-pole either. He wears his Lair bout as long as Father John's; but it is as black as it can be black, sir, as a raven's breast, and as flowing as water."

"Then he is a your g man?" asked Marshall.

"I should think he was about thirty. But the most remarkable feature about him is his eyes. Why, sir, the reds are almost as afraid of them as they are of his rifle."

" What is there peculiar about them?"

- brimstone ain't nowhere. Why, sir, that night when he was fightin' for us, I just looked into his eyes once, and hang me, if I di ln't feel as if streaks of lightning were curling all around my body. But this was only when his dander was up; for, after all was safe, and he held Molly in his arms, an' looked at wife an' me, them eyes, sir, filled up with water. An though that water was a-bilin' an' bubblin' out, it had put out the fire, an' they looked as mild as a woman's."
  - "Then you know nothing of his history?"
  - " Nothing, until be came to the plains."

"Where does he reside?"

- "That's another secret. Nobody knows. Somewhere in the mountains, I suppose. In some cave, may hap. Shouldn't wonder if he was something like the birds, skippin' around th' re-stin' just where night found him."
- "This is all very interesting, and somewhat singular, I con is," so it Marshall. "But it is time to make arrangements for the night. It always has been my custom, when encompared it is the night, especially in this dangerous country, to throw but a picket-grand. But, as our numbers are small, we will be compelled to dispense with them. Do you think it advisable that we should reheve each other at guard during the night?" he asked of the old man.

"It is proper that a constant watch should be kept. We may not be disturbed, but it is well to be on the safe side. We are on dangerous ground, and extreme caution is highly necessary."

At this moment the lieutens; t's horse raised his head, snuffed the air, and acted in a singular manner.*

When Marshall observed this movement in Dahlgren, habecame alert.

"There are strangers near us."

"Savages, think you?" asked the old man.

"I am satisfied that it is some person or persons who could scarcely be termed friends. Still I may be mistaken. Certain it is that some one or some thing is near us."

The horse, however, became more quiet, and, at length.

quietly prostrated himself upon the ground.

Oakley did not appear altogether satisfied. He moved un easily up and down, while his eyes wandered in every direction. Still, he could distinguish nothing in the darkness.

The old man and Marshall wrapped themselves in their blankets, and, making the earth their bed, were, to all appearances, soon fast asleep. They took care, however, to find a place partially sheltered, which would protect them from any secret shot, if a fee was furking near.

But did they sleep? Ah, who could tell the conflicting emotions that wrung the heart of each! Marshall, with his when accustomed to a wild life, or to In han and other warrant, which equal to that of the dog. That they are passive, and make their minimistration is, in most cases, also that. They are often and article is in a hill character than the first and the grass, give him and the limit to but the but sting shell. In head, instances have seen known whether it is a limit of the poor beast had failen to the earth.

An instance of this kind occurred at Gettyshur. A horse, since the crash of the batt the was to an Islaty a minus in., in the same of put less than two first and refer to the same of the control of the present hopes and fears, thoughts of wife and child. The old man and the connecting link between the present and the past, which had left its furrows on his cheeks, and its sorrows in his silver locks.

the state of the savage or the garrilla. Then then seuse a semicrostrate.

Onlikey was on guard. He kept himself "covered" by a large tree, and sometimes listened with breathless silence. On wor twice he heard the rustling of the leaves and the limit of a twig, which, to the experienced hunter, always are evidences that to others might be deemed too trivial for attention.

It was near midnight. Marshall had twice requested Oakley to let him take his place on guard, but the latter positively refused. The old man appeared to sleep soundly, although he had the long rifle, which he had brought with him, in a firm grasp.

Upon a sullen, the horse sprung up, and, throwing back his ears, leaped forward with open mouth, making a furious attack upon some object concealed among the shrubbery. The yelping of a dog followed, which, judging by the sound, started from the spot. The horse then quietly returned.

Marsh dl and the old man had started to their feet.

" What think you of that?" asked Old John.

"Think? By hokey, there ain't but one thing to think about it."

" And what is that?"

of the deg, instead of the Ingen."

"I has wit. Keep close—squat." Oakley threw himself upon the ground.

It was well for the others that they followed his example for a strain of fire was men, and the report of a rith followed close at hand.

Mariall was about to ruch forward to the spot where his

They won't torch Dublgren-they want him for their own use. We must keep close and watch the chances. There are a number of the savages there, or they never would have ventured to fire that shot. It is likely they do not know our numbers. Daylight will develop something. In the mean time we must remain as much as possible under cover."

The night passed slowly away. There had been one or two attempts on the part of some one to get pessession of the horse, but the animal defended himself in a most remarkable manner. There were, also, occasional noises, such as low whisperings, the moving of underbrush, and a low growl. But our flier is kept close, preferring to await daylight, rather than the unitainty of an action in the dark.

The day came at length, but not a living being was visit!

"Come," said Marshall, "let us continue our journey."

"No," replied the old man "There is work before us yet. The savages are concealed behind those rocks, and the moment we show ourselves, it will be to meet death."

"What is to be done?" asked Marshall.

"We must outwit them. Oakley, you as d Marshall remain here, while I take a scout around and see what is going on. Oh! you need not look surprised. I am not so old but that I am yet able to climb the rocks, or that I am entirely unacquainted with savage warfare."

The old man seized his rifle, and started down the mountain side. An hour passed, and there was a movement among the rocks, and the plumed heads of several savages appeared. Then one of them ventured forth. Marshall drew his revolver and fired. This was a very injudicious action, for several of the Indians, judging by the single shot that there could not be many opposed to them, rushed forth. The lieutenant discurarged the other five barrels, but without farther effect than the wounding of three of the Indians. Four others remained untouched, and these came bounding forward. They well knew that the shots fired were not by the hands of hinters, whom they feared more than the regular sold re-

Oakley raised his true ritle, and the forement In lian fell with a wild yet. Three now remained, and their pieces were loaded. It was therefore the policy of Oakley to prevent the savages from using them, if possible, and to depend upon the close struggle and the knife.

But, before the encounter commenced, a wild yell are select a few yards from the savages, and then a shot. Another of their number fell. The two remaining turned to encounter their unexpected foe, but, the heavy barrel of a rifle came trashing down upon the head of another, and he rolled upon the carth. The rescuer seized the last remaining savage, and, as if he had been a mere child in size, hurled him down among the broken rocks, with such force, that scarcely a groan followed his fall.

"QUINDARO!" cried Oakley, as he recognized the strange man.

"Quindaro, at your service!"

And without waiting for another word, the new-comer stated rapolly up the rugged mountain again.

"Stay, Quindaro, stay," called Oakley and Marshall.

" No! I have more work before me. We shall meet again."

It was not long before the old hermit returned, and the party continued their journey. Arriving at Laramie river, they found no difficulty in procuring a small boat, and, as they had old John reached the stream, before nightfull Marshall and Old John reached the fort, or rather its ruins. Oakley, having volunteered to see the horse Dahlgren safely down, followed the stream at his leisure, and crossed at the fort before darkness set in.

The savages had left the vicinity of the fort, and a few of the soldiers had returned. Of these Marshall could glean but a confused account of what had happened. Of his wife and child they knew nothing.

What agony filled the soul of the husband and father! Uncertainty with regard to their fate appeared really worse than the positive knowledge of their death. And the image of the Pawnee miscreant rose up before him in all its horror. He sunk upon the ground and groaned in very agony of soul Oll John touched him gently and spoke:

"Come, don't yield to such feelings. You must act now. No doubt she is still alive. It must be our work to rescu?

her or to perish for her sake."

At this moment a soldier came up, who gave a detail of the events, and indicated the direction taken by Wontum and the child, followed by the mother. Marshall was about to start in immediate pursuit, but the body of soldiers which had been sent after the murdered party, having just arrived, he was detained until the morning following.

Oakley and the old man took their departure, however—not waiting for the soldiery. They proposed to work in their own WAY.

CHAPTER V.

THE ENCOUNTER.

Wonrow did not expect that the mother would follow him to closely. He had calculated upon drawing a number of the soldiers out of the fort, and, if this could be done, a successful attack might be made upon them. This resulted as he anticipated. He had no doubt the fort would fall, but, in case of failure, as he could not secure both his victims at that time, he hoped that the mother would eventually seek him in the mountains in order to regain possession of her boy.

A gleam of sayage joy lit up his face, as he saw Mananie spring from the wall and follow toward the river, having no doubt but that she would continue her persuit. He knew that three years had not altogether eradicated the habits she had acquired while living with the Indians, and that river or mountain would not be a barrier to the chase.

And so it proved; for the frantic mother plused Lot when she reached the river, but, plunging in, she swam for the opposite shore, with her old skill.

Wontum had scated himself, and was watching the progress of the fight which was going on in and near the firt. Seeing that he was not pursued by the troops, he determined to await the result of the encounter. Manonic would reach him in a few moments, but this was as he wished.

The struggle was a brief one, and Laranie had then.

Manonic now approached the savare. Little Harry was rested upon the earth by the side of the Indian. The plant when he saw his mother, he started up and some list har arms. She then turned as if to retrace her steps, hat Wontum caught her, saying:

" Wild Bird, sit."

"Not by you, monster that you are!" she cried.

"Wontum no monster. Wontum great warrier. He kill enemy."

"And steal little children. Wontum is a mean thick"

- " Ugh !"
- "Why have you thus taken my child? Is it not mean business for a great warrior?"
  - "Don't Wild Bird want her-child?"
- "Oh! yes. Give him to me and I will always be your friend."
  - " Be wife ?"
  - " How can I be your wife, when I am already married ?"
  - "Ugh! Wild Bird must go with Wontum."
  - " Where?"
- "To wigwam in Pawnee country. Wild Bird shall be his

The savage seized the child and started on his return toward the fort. He had seen the result of the fight. This time he procured a small canoe, and, entering it, he soon landed near the scene of carnage. Manonic had remained close by his side.

After the destruction of the fort, or its interior buildings, the savages appeared to be satisfied. At the command of Wontum, they commenced their retreat. Among the captures made were a number of fine horses. Manonic was placed upon one of these, while Wontum mounted another, taking the child in his arms. He started off, bidding the mother follow him, which she did without hesitancy.

The object of the Indian now appeared to be gained, or, at least, the principal part of it. The Wild Bird and her child were in his power. The father's heart would be wrung, even if he was not captured or slain. It was not the savage's purpose to fight again, if it could be avoided. He knew, by what he had overheard at the fort, that a body of men had gone up the valley. On their return, it was likely they would come down the Plate river road; hence, the chief gave or lere to full back by the way of Laramie Peak. It was quite likely the salities will follow when they bearned what had occurred. It was the chief's intention, therefore, to reach Dayles Gard, where the whites' entitlery could not be brought to hear a line them, as the savages entertained a mortal horror of those two little field pieces which they had once faced at South Pass could not believe that Wontum would injure her or the boy and, might she not, by some stratagem, effect her escape! Her chief cause for anguish was the unaccountable absence of her husband, and her uncertainty as to his fate.

Manonie, knowing it would he usaless to plead with the

They had reached the base of the peak, when Wontum suddenly halted, making a sign to his warriors to do the same Then they moved rapidly into a thick covering of mountain willow which grew upon the bank of a little creek, which would effectually conceal them from any party passing the main road.

They were scarcely concealed when Manonie heard the clatter of horses' feet, and, judging by the sound, a large part was approaching. It must be her friends: would not be rescue be now effected? Perhaps her husband was one of the number! She now saw that the savages did not inter an attack, as they prostrated themselves upon the groun! It would be necessary for her to give the alarm, which she determined to do, although there would be great danger to herself and child in the fight sure to ensue.

But in this she was doomed to disappointment; for, just a the advance of the approaching horsemen had arrived nearly opposite the spot where she was concealed, Wontum places the point of his knife at the breast of the boy, and said:

"If Wild Bird make noise, me kill."

Manonic shuddered and remained silent. The clatter of hoofs, the jingle of swords against the riders' spurs, the voi of men and the laughter of others, fell upon her ears, but size dared not speak. Friends were near, yet unconscious of her presence, and would soon leave her far behind, still a wretched prisoner. A single scream would call their attention, and yet it would be the death of her boy. The last horsemen were passing. Hope did not sink within her. Her time had not yet come.

Just at that moment the horse upon which Wontum was seated, began pawing the earth. This act was followed by a whirmy, also repeated by the horse on which Manonia role. The horsemen came to a halt. A large dog, too, ran into the willow shrubbery, and then back to his masters, setting up a fairful howling.

Ugh! Bad — much bad," exclaimed Wontum. He glanced around him, and then, without uttering a worl, dismounted, and ran swiftly up the side of the peak, still holding the boy in his arms. The mother followed, evidently determined not to lose sight of her precious treasure.

Nor was this movement made an instant too soon; for the report of a cannon was heard, and the canister came tearing through the shrubbery. The horse upon which Manenie had any seated, reared, and then, with a cry almost human in the tones, plunged forward, and fell to the earth, dead.

The savages sprung up with a wild and defiant yell, and rushed from their concealment. But they were met by a galling fire, and nearly a third of their number bit the dust.

The horsemen consisted of over one hundred United States drago as, well mounted and armed, each man carrying a carbine slung at his side, and a brace of pistols. Hearing the whinny of the horse, they at once divined the true state of the case. Immediately forming in line, they brought their artillery, which consisted of two light six-pound field-pieces, into position. Of course, they were not aware of the presence of captives, but had no doubt of its being an Indian ambush. The dog—a sugacious animal—on several occasions had been the means of detecting the concealed foe. Therefore, the gans were charged, and the iron hall harled into the willow, as the best method of bringing out the human tigers concealed there.

The troops were surprised to see so large a number, but were prepared to receive them. A second and a third volley was poured in upon them, but, as these were from the pistols, they were less effective than the first, which was given with the earline. The cannon, however, cut them down terribly. It was heaven's thunder to them, from which there was no escape.

The come a charge, and a hand-to-hand encounter. The six was for the with a despiration a dome equals, but they could not be reach before the pends rous death-noke of the horsenion's albers. Besides, they were without a leader. The voice of Wontum, which had cheered them on in many a fight, was not heard. Many had not seen his novement, and supposed he had fallen with the others.

Although the battle raged fiercely, it was brief. In half an hour after the savages were discovered, two-thirds of their number were either killed or wounded, and the others, panicatricken, were flying up the rarged side of Laramie Peak.

Wontum had not been seen by any of the solliers, as his light was covered by the thick wood. He advanced to a said distance, and then stopped to watch the progress of the battle. He was not altogether confident of victory, but did not at ticipate so decided a defeat. When he saw the result, it was to rave like a madman. He had not left his warriors from any personal fear; but revenge still was the passion uppermost in his soul, to secure which he must retain possession of Manonie. He still held the child, and the poor mother preferred any fate to leaving it.

It was impossible for the cavalry to pursue the fegitives up the rocky steep, and they at once turned their attention to their dead and wounded. In killed there were but four, but there were over fifty wounded. The Indians had fought principally with the tomahawk and knife.

Manonie was doomed to witness the departure of her friends, and her heart almost sunk within her. They were not even aware that she was a captive, or, surely, they would make further efforts for her rescue. She en leavored to draw from the savage his intentions, but he was silent and sallen. She inquired about her husband, but a bitter frown was the only answer.

The journey was now renewed. It was a weary one, as they were now without horses. They did not follow the valley, but kept along the mountain ridge. It was nearly lark when the party, who had joined Wontum after their limit, halt tell at the foot of a ridge, upon the bank of a be attail after a tf water. There was no sign of a road or trail mar, and Maneric could not tell any thing with regard to her for all methods and mountains. She was said if I however, that the stream was one of the limb tributer of the Platte, and began making her catculations for escape during the night.

The camp was formed. Manonic was placed in the center of a circle made by living savages, and little Harry by her side. But, before he slept, Wontum stripped the bark from some young saplings, and, making a strong thong, tied it firmly around her body, and then to his own. This seemed, indeed, to seal her fate, for what escape could there be from that thong?

It was not long before the heavy breathing of the band convinced Manonie that most of them were sleeping. It had been along that grade for them, as well as for herself. Her child had fallen asleep in her arms, and it was with difficulty she could keep her own eyes from closing. But she had resolved upon a desperate attempt to escape, despite her bands and critical position.

With this intention, her first action was to release herself from the thong which bound her. This she accomplished by gnawing it with her teeth. She was about to move from the spot, when Wontum caught her by the wrist, and held it with a greep so firm, that it caused her to utter an exclamation of pain. This was, apparently, unnoticed by the savage, and Manonie became convinced that it was only a movement of chance, and that he still was sleeping. He had probably set his mind so much upon the subject of preventing her escape, that even in his sleep any movement upon her part would disturb him. She raised herself partially and listened. The In lian was breathing hard and regular; but, occasionally, he gave vent to ejaculations of rage, although the words were unlicting rishable. He was implacable even in his dufine—a savage, even in his slumbers.

Manonie gazed around her. Every thing denoted profound sleep. It was the time for action. The hot blood mounted to the temples of the poor girl as her eyes fell upon the knife of the chief. It was in his belt, and glittered in the dim me a ight eminously. She cautiously reached forth her han I am I drew the weapon from the belt, to gaze upon its keep point, still rel with the blood of poor Blair. A shubler I was I over her frame. Then she gazed into the face of her whild, who was sweetly sleeping; then down the little stream, and then up into the clear blue sky, with its millions of stars; then again upon the face of the monster whose fiendish nature had brought her into her present situation, and wrought such misery. Was it right for her to strike the blow which would free the world from such a wretch? This appeared to be the only course. But would her hand be firm, and her aim true? And would heaven smile on such an act?

The poor girl raised her eyes to heaven, and, in the faith of a true believer, implored its aid.

"Oh, thou Great Spirit, help me to do the right!"

It was a brief but earnest prayer, which seemed to give her strength and courage. She raised the knife, and would have buried it to the hilt in his bosom, but, at that instant, the grasp which the savage had fastened upon her left wrist was loosened. and she was free! The knife was lowered, and the monster was spared.

Cautiously she raised herself, and took the child in her arms. She gazed searchingly around. All was quiet. It was a moment of terrible anxiety. Carefully she stepped over the sleepers. She could hear the beatings of her own heart.

In a moment she stood beside the water, free. And yet, not free. For, at that most critical moment, little Harry awoke, and cried with fear. This arouse! Wontum. He sprung after the captives. The poor mother saw him as he sprung to his feet. She knew that escape would be impossible, and, with the most remarkable presence of min!, she said, loud enough to be heard by the savage:

"Does little Harry want a drink of water? He shall have it. Manonie will give it to him."

Taking her little cup, she dipped it in the stream, and held it up for the child, who drank heartily. Then the mother added:

- "Now, Harry, go to sleep again, that's a good child."
- "Where is papa?" asked the boy. The question was like an arrow in the breast of the mother, but she replied:
  - "Never mind, darling, we will see papa soon."
  - " To-morrow ?"
  - " Perhaps to-morrow."
- "Where is that bad man that took me away from my
  - " Hush !"
- "Here!" exclaimed the savage, as he appreached the spot.
  "Here bad man."

Wontum led the captive back to the center of the circle. She gave up all further hope of escape that night, and resigned nerself to sleep. In the stillness, a voice came over the val-

" You should have struck the blow!"

Wontum heard the voice, and started up—so indistinctly, however, that he was not sure whether it really was a voice, or his own threy. But it brought consolation to Manonic. True, she did not recognize the tones as familiar, but it must be a friend. She was not, in leed, deserted, and was content.

The night passed slowly away; and the mother and child, overcome by the toils of the previous day, slept, thus gaining fresh strength for coming trials.

CHAPTER VI.

FRIENDS.

OLD JOHN and Olkley, after leaving the fort, or rather its ruins, scated themselves upon the bank of the Laramie, and entered into a conversation with regard to the events which had occurred, and the course it was best for them to pursue. Oakley often had met Manonie while she was yet residing with the savages, and was, like all others, fondly attached to her. But Old John never had seen her, which was somewhat singular, as he had been in the vicinity even some years previous to her marriage with Lieutenant Marshall. What was still more strange, he had never heard of her, until he met her husband at his cabin on the mountain side. He evidently was more of a solitaire than he thought.

It was at length doubled that they should follow up the trail of the savares, and when Wontam was found, one of them, should keep a close watch upon his movements, and therefore in what manner the captives were to be disposed of while the other should return and report to the marrion. A thorough examination convined them that the savage must have accompanied the main party, as there were no signs of a toparate trail.

Their stay had been so short at the fort, that they had not learned of the second encounter between the troops and the ravages. With early dawn they set out, and pursued the trail, but were somewhat puzzled by the tracks of the in and a horsemen which had almost obliterated those of the savars. They were of the opinion that the latter had turned aside on the approach of the soldiers, and that no encounter had almost place.

A few hours' rapid walk brought them to the battle-group. L. A search revealed the fact that the Indians had consold themselves. The horse which had been taken from the fort, and was killed by the cannon's discharge, was still apon the spot.

The professional hunter is as shrewd in following the trail as the Indian himself, and oftentimes more so. He can detect the slightest evidence, such as the ben ling of a bash, a broken twig, or the disturbance of a leaf. And this Oally traced the course taken by the savage and Manadia the former by the huge proportions of his moceasin, and the captive by the tiny footprint. The evidence was plain where they had seated themselves upon the ground, and that the new direction taken by them along the "Black Hills" rise toward Deer Creek.

It was decided, after they were perfectly satisfied upon this point, that one of them must return immediately to the fort and inform Marshall of these particulars. But all it should be was not a question so callly satisfied, but all changes the right to encounter the danger, and to easy the exciton at of following the trail.

"Wal, new, John," said Oakley, "you're grit an' no me take But, Lord love you, I don't bilieve you know my more bout Injuns then a baby. Why, you're so pleased that you wouldn't hurt a muskeeter any way, an' I don't think that, in your old days, you is an har to harn new tricks."

No! Could you now? Wal, persups you mugat. But I don't som how you can know any thing about their habits, for you're alors up at your cabin in the mountain, readin' your books an' sich like; but I tell you what it is, John: you may have a power of knowledge so far as book edlication goes, but I cae late them kind of books don't tell much light Injuns. You've got to study the great book as lays speed to thefore ye here." Oakley pointed to the surrounding menery, and the old man bowe i his head with reverence. In moment he said:

- "Well, Oakley, let us give our opinions as to the intentions of the savage abductor, and his purpose in carrying off the child."
- "All right. Go ahead. Give us yer idees, an' we'll see how much yer kin read ther savage."
  - " He will follow the Black Hills till he reaches Deer creek." .
  - " I think so, percisely. Go ahead ag'in."
- "And then push directly across the valley, until he reaches the Sweetwater."
  - "Jest my 'pinion ag'in."
  - "And will not passe until he has reached Devil's Gate."
  - " Jes' so," my old friend. "Try yer tongue ag'in."
- "There he will consider himself safe, and will be so, consparatively; for it will be impossible to bring artillery to bear upon the savages when concealed in the caves, and a few hundred of them might successfully hold at buy a large army."
- "Jes' so, sir. Right a rin. But, I rather reck'n there'd be another way to get at 'em."
- "I understand you. They must be surrounded and starred out. This will be the only course if they succeed in reaching the Gate."
- "If they succeed in reachin' it? An' how in thunder do '7" are little to prevent 'em from doin' so, will yer please to Jemonstrate?"
  - do you suppose there are?"
  - Wal, I think I can tell pretty surfin. They didn't expect to be followed, an' so they don't go single-file an' tree in each other's tracks. Let me see." Oakley examined around for several minutes, and at length replied:
  - yor plan?" And now what's

"It is to have the Indians intercepted before they reach the Sweetwater."

"Wal, s'pose we should intercept 'em; what are we to do agin' sixty on 'em !"

"You don't understand me. You are to make all possible asste back to the fort. Inform Marshall. The troops are mounted, and the savages are not. It will not be difficult to reach the river before they do."

"Yes. That's all very nice. But, why do you say that I am to go back?"

"You prefer that I should go?"

"Yes, John. I don't think you are as good at scoutin' as I be; besides, you are too old to be knockin' around the woods after Injuns. If you go to the fort, you will have a chance to ride."

"Why, Oakley, you are almost as old as myself."

"Wal, that's so; but then, ye see, I have been used to roughin' on it until I'm as tough as an oak knot, an' twice as strong as you, ef you be bigger."

"Do you think so?"

"I do jest think so. If you think you can han lie old Jack Oakley, come right along an' try it. You'll find I'm same on a b'ar-hug."

The old map smiled, and, advancing, seized Oakley. Jack made three or four desperate efforts to lift the old man from his fect, but could not do it. During the time, John stood quietly, although his grasp was firm. At length, by a sullen movement, he caught Jack in a manner termed by the loys a "hip-lock," and, making an effort at the same moment, hurled him entirely over his head. Oakley came down on the ground like a huge log. But he sprung to his feet with a "whoop," and seized the hermit a second time; but, quick at thought, he was again hurled high into the air, and cannot down with a tremendous "chug."

This time Jack raised himself slowly to his feet, rubbed his arms, neck and head, looked at the old man, who stood smiling before him, with a peculiar gaze, not unmingled with admiration, and then exclaimed:

"Je-ru-sha! but you are some. Guv us yer hand."

"You think I would make a good Indian fighter?" Old John smilingly asked.

"Fust chop. An I'll tell you what it is. You must go at it. 'Tis a shame for you to be tucked up in that cabin of yours, when ye ought to be in the mountains killin' half a dozen reds in a day."

"I could not take the life of a savage, even, unless I was justified in doing so in my own defense, or for the safety of others."

"But, we are at war now, and trery red we meet is our enemy."

"So I shall look upon every one, if he gives the slightest evidence of a hostile purpose, and I shall act accordingly. But, now tell me, who is to return to the fort?"

"Wal, I cac'late I'h nave to be the chap. An' no time is to be lost; so hoora for father John, once the old hermit, but now a reg'lar Injun fighter, an' one as can flop old Jack Oakley, as easy as the old woman can flop a hoe-cake." Saying which, he commenced his return to the fort.

Oakley soon reached the foot of the mountains, and struck off across the valley. As he rubbed his shoulders, he exclaimed:

"By the great jewallopers, but that old feller is a snorter, an' no mistake. I wonder where he l'arned that hug?"

"To whom do you refer?" asked a voice near him.

Oakley started. There, not two rods away, he saw the " Quindaro !" .

"Yes. What are you doing here, Oakley?"

- "Oh! the old boy is to pay ginerally? Oakley then went on to explain all the particulars of the events which had recently occurred, so far as they were known to him.
  - "And where is Mary?" asked Quindaro.

· Who ?"

'Your daughter."

Oh, yes. Molly. That's what I call the gal, although I believe the old woman did say that she was rightly named Mary."

Where is she?"

- "Safe up at the old hermit's cabin—she an' the old woman,
  - "Do you really think she will be safe there?"

"Oh, bless ye, yes. Thar ain t a red this side of Callfirnia as would touch Old John. But I'll tell ye a secret of ye will keep it to yerself."

"What is it?"

"That old man is death on a blar-hug. I found that out a few moments ago." And old Jack rubbed his shoulders ag in.

"Where is the old man?" asked Quindaro, with a struct of mterest.

off on the trail, an' I shouldn't be a bit surprised if he d'al some tall work. I'll tell ye another secret. The old read is goin' to join us agin' the reds. That's 'rue as gespel preachin'; 'cos he said so, an' he ain't the one to lie about any thing. But, why hain't ye been up to see Molly in so long a time? She's kinder takin' it to heart I reck'n, for the gal's grown; the in' the like, and she don't laugh an' sing as she used to low when we first settled in the plains."

"Oh, Mr. Oakley, these troubles are enough to drive the smile even from the face of nature itself, or cause the line heavens to frown in anger. Why have I not been to visit you? It is because I have so much work to do here. And while the war lasts, I can devote myself to but one object. It is true, I wear the image of your daughter ever in my hant; but there is a wound there from which the blood flows so freely, that it hides from my view all but that which cause it. When I am amply avenged, then I will visit you—but not until then—no, not until ther." The specifier was visibly affected.

"You must excuse me, Mr. Quindaro, but I see you're an eddicated man, an' I'm afcard my poor Molly won't be no match for you. But you won't—oh, I know I'm an old fool, an' ought to be kicked for askin' such a questi h—lat I do love my gal so much that it would break my old heart, tough as it is, if any thing should happen to her."

" Well, what were you going to ask?"

"You wouldn't win the love of my poor gal and then leave her to break her heart and die?"

Quindaro started to his feet, and gazed in silvare qua

"Oh, you needn't say that you won't, because I know it and you may kick me if you like for askin' such a thing. It was only a passin' thought. I alers believed you were a first-chop, right homomobic man, an' I think so yet. But you would excuse me if you know what it was to be the father of a most dootiful an' devoted daughter."

The powerful frame of Quindaro trembia with emotion. He covered his face with his hands; but, at length, he raised his head, and answered:

"No, Mr. Oakley, I do not know what it is to be a father. But I do know what it is to be a son and a brother. And I know what it is to lose all. Oh, it was a dreadful night!" he continue! as if speaking his own thoughts rather than addressing another, "a night of horror! Oh! the streams of blood, the dying shricks of those so dear, the crackling flame, and—but I am avenged, although not fully so!"

The heart of the strong man heaved in the intensity of his folings, the hot blood mounted to his temples, while his eyes gleamed like living coals. Oakley gazed unon him with some degree of surprise. He had felt sure that his cause of gricf had some connection with the savages, but this was the first time a word had been spoken by which he could get the slightest clue as to the real facts.

- "Did the Injuns do this?" he asked.
- " Ay, the accursed Pawnees."
- "Did they kill your folks?"
- "Yes; flather, mether, sister, brothers—all—all perished but myself."
  - "Are you sure all were killed?"
- out before me." Yes. I saw their mangled bodles stretched
  - "Did you see 'em buried fur sartin?"
- "No. I learnly escaped with my own life. But, when I returned, a two days over I saw five new-made graves, and this was sufficient for me."
  - " And you followed the Pannees?"
- "You I have a laber or came to the mountains, fellowed them. I have had list for life, years ago, but I will not hate one jot of my revenue or cease, my work until the zonursed race has been b'otted from existence. Already my very name is a terror to them, but it shall become doubly so.

I will pursue them to extermination—the monsters!"

" Where is your home, Quindaro?"

"Among the rocks in the mountains, in the valleys, by the river's side—anywhere, if duty calls me. Quindaro is like the wild bird, free to go where he pleases."

" Have you ever met old Father John?"

- "I have seen him, I think, but have never met him face to
  - " Quindaro, promise me one thing."

" What is it ?"

- "That you will visit the old hermit soon as you get a chance."
  - "To what end?"

"No matter. Promise me."

"Well, I will do so. But I must now be off. I shall follow the trail of those savages. Perhaps I can succeed in rescuing this lady and her child, of whom you were speaking. And I may meet or overtake the old hermit, as you say he has gone in that directon." Quindaro extended his hand, shook that of old Jack warmly, then started off, at a regit pace, up the Black Hill range.

Oakley gazed after him until he was lest to view, and then exclaimed:

"I'd be willin' to bet my scalp against the fist red skin's I meet, that if he does overtake Old John he'll find his father in right-down carnest! They are as like as two peas! Some thin' tells me they are father and son. When!—what if it should be? But I must be off, for I'm losin' time."

Oakley now started for the fort, which he at length reached in safety. At once calling for Marshell, he detailed all the facts. It was a great consolation for the husband and lattler to learn that two such men as Old John and Quin haro were upon the trail of the savages.

Arrangements were quickly made for pursuit. A hody of nearly two hundred soldiers had just arrived from Fort Jeff reon, therefore a considerable number could be sparely and still leave a strong garrison behind.

Before daybreak of the third day after the in macre in the out of Laramie, at the head of two hundred and fifty horsemen and two pieces of artillery. Hope beat high in his heart as the cavalcade dashed up the valley toward the clear Sweetwater, which they hoped to be able to reach by the evening of the following day. Oakley roce in the advance, acting as guide.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MESSENGER.

The morning dawned. It was beautiful and bright. The little streams, that danced and sparkled in the sunlight, vied with the fresh songsters in their music. It was a scene to inspire joy in the heart of man, or even soften the savage breast.

But the heart of Wontum knew no pity. He sat by the waters of the beautiful Deer creek, silent, his brow black as midnight, and his snake-like eyes fixed upon his victim. Poor Manonie shrunk from his gaze. She held her child close to her breast; this appeared to be her only joy. But she thought of the voice she had heard. "You should have struck the blow." She could not be mistaken, for the sound had aroused the savage, and even now he would east his eyes suspiciously around, as if he half suspected the presence of some dreaded foe. Why was he hesitating? Did he fear to advance? Manonie could see beyond her a beautiful valley, which she at once recognized, and knew that it stretched far away to the Sweetwater, a distance of over fifty miles, only occasionally troken by sharp knolls and gentle-sloping rides. She hoped the savage would take his course tarough this valley, as he would be compelled to pass the cabins of many of the settlers. She did not even hope that they could be any present help to her, but she thought some white might see her, and thus be able to send some word to her husband, of her safety and of her whereabouts.

The arose to her feet, and strolled leisurely along the bank

Wontum detained him. The little fellow turned and struck the savage a violent blow in the face. This, instead of racking the chief angry, rather pleased him, for a half still played around his repulsive mouth, and he muttered:

" I'gh!-good! Make Injun-brave!"

He patted the bey upon the head, but the child had too vivil a recollection of the occurrences of the previous day to nake frients" with his enemy. He only showed his temper" the more.

Manonie kept on her way until she had reached a distance of pernaps twenty rods from the savages. Her purpose was not suspected by Wontum, although he watched her with an eager and an eagle eye.

She cast searching glances around her, hoping to see the person from whom the message proceeded the night before All at once, she was startled; something fell at her foot. It was a pebble, to which was attached a bit of paper. She grasped it as the reprieved man would clutch a deciment which prolonged his life. She cast back a glance at the savage, to notice if her movements had been detect in his Wentum was still toying with the child. She tore the paper from the stone to which it was attached, and read:

"Hope! To-night you shall be free. Your his and is aware of your situation and is making every cil it for your rescue. I am your friend and shall remain man you."

Manonic raised her eyes, and directly before her, not twenty yards distant, peering over a fallen tree, she saw a pair of dark eyes gazing earnestly upon her. The stranger raised him if partially from concealment, placed his finger upon his lips indicating silence, and then disappeared from view.

Manonie could scarcely suppress the cry of will dell he which trembled upon her lips, and the first impulse was to bough forward into the arms of the straint r. Dut, with an effort she controlled her emotion, and a min turn of toward the place where her child and Wentum were mut it. She trembled violently, and clasped little Harry to her breast in apparent righters. To this, however, too half a give no head.

She had not heard any word from the structure, but that book thrillied her. Nor did she recollect ever having seen him before. But, he brought her hope, which amounted almost to certainty, as she could see the realization, but a short time distant, of her restoration to loved and loving hearts.

To-night. Oh! was she to be free to-night? Was she indeel to meet the idol of her soul again the his forevermore?

But, how was this to be accomplished? Was there to be a therebutle? If so, her husband might be killed. Around her were nearly seventy powerful savages, and she knew of but the friend near. Still, she felt a confidence in the dear, treasured message which had promised her freedom, even though there was a possibility of failure.

The sivages now arose, and made preparations to continue their journey. With grief Manonie saw they intended to avoid the valley. They continued along the ridge of hills, but the plain below was visible most of the time, as the mountain was spars by timber 1. It was a weary journey for Manonie. On several course has she was compelled to pause for rest. The above of Wontum was much delayed in consequence. The save is appoined much annoyed at this; and give vent to their folians by anary books and words, which Manonie readily understood, as she had not forgotten the language which she had learned in infancy.

On one occasion a diqute arose. One of the savages declared that Wontum was waring the war for his own selfish purposes, and that he had only commerced it for the sake of capturing the pale face squaw, and this had cost them over a hundred warriers. And he appealed to those around him to put the girl to death, as her scalp was worth more than herself alive, and she never would become a squaw again, but would always prove a source of trouble. The boy should be saved, as he was now so young that he would soon forget his parents, and perhaps become a useful member of their tribe. He is given, even at his age, evidences of much spirit, and put they would become a great warrior.

Peer Minonie II tened to this conversation with a painful sterest. She gazed flutively around her, hoping to catch a gain; se of her stronge friend, but he was as invisible as a spirit. It was fluilly declied that, as she belonged to their tribe, in spite of her marriage with the pale face, they had no right to kill her without the sanction of the head chief. So she was to be taken before Nemona upon their arrival at Devil's Gate.

The sun was just sinking from sight when Wontum paused, and began the arrangements for their night camp. The circle was formed as before. In the center a few young saplings were irawn together at the top, and fastened. These were covered with brush and leaves, until quite a comfortable wigwam or tovering had been formed. Manonie watched the proceedings with some degree of interest.

She was now seated upon a point where she could plainly descry a large portion of the valley. Oh! how eagerly she watched the distance, hoping to see the troops merge into the open space from the narrow ravine which skirts Horse-shoe creek! But she was doomed to disappointment: no troops appeared.

Wontum came to her side, and seated himself upon the ground. He gazed at her steadily for several moments. There was a peculiar expression upon his face. Manonie could not divine its meaning. At length he said, speaking half in the Pawnee tongue, and half in his broken English:

" You tried to kill me last night!"

Manonie started. She did not think for a moment that the savage was aware of her attempt upon his life. The knife had almost been in the act of descending, and yet he had not moved at the time. She had ceturned the weapon to his belt, and still he appeared to sleep. How he had discovered the fact, she could not tell; and yet, he had done so. The crimson which mounted to her face as she heard these words, was a tell-tale to the Indian, for he asked:

"Why you want to kill Wontum?"

Manonic, seeing that it was useless to deny the act, replied:

- "I did not wish to kill you, unless it became necessary to
  - "Ther you did try to bill Wontum?"
  - " Yes."
  - "Why not do it, den?"
- "Because, at the moment I was about to strike the blow, you released my hand which you had been holding, and I thought I could escape without committing the deed. But, how did you know I made such an attempt?"

Wontum pointed to his knife, and said:

"You draw my knife. You no careful when you put it back in my belt. You put it in bullet-pouch! Why you wish to escape from me?"

"That I may return to my husband, of course."

"And shall soon have husband prisoner. Him I bura You be Wontum's squaw, den I no burn. Wontum want Wild Bird for squaw, and shall have her, or burn husband."

Then he will die, for I shall never be your squaw. But my dear husband, he is not yet in your power, and I don't think ever will be. If you would save your own life, you had better set use free at once, for my husband's revenge will be sure and terrible."

"Ugh! Wontum no fear soldier pale-face! Soldier poor man in fight. Let him come. I shall be glad to meet him at Devil's Gate."

Manonie's quick and ever alert eye caught a glimpse of what she believed to be a human figure moving among the rocks at some distance from her. She was not positive, as the shadow appeared suddenly, and as quickly vanished. She averted her eyes from the spot, in order that the Indian's attention might not be attracted in that direction. A smile lit up her face. This Wontum observed and asked:

" Wild Bird thinks pleasant thoughts."

"I was thinking of my friends, and the revenge they shall visit upon you."

"Ugh! Wild Dir I expect them to-night?" A si nifleant smile rested upon the face of the savage, and she feared he knew more of the stranger than she had supposed. But this could scarcely be, or he would have made some effort to capture him. She therefore replied:

"I shall see my friends soor. I shall escape the first op portanity, you may be assured."

"Wontum knows that; but chief take good care of his prisoners. When comes to-morrow night we shall reach Pawn e village. Then Wild Bird shall either become chief's winder his slave. Does Wild Bird care which?"

" You may not reach that place."

- I have no fears. I shall not leave the mountains at all,

but reach the cave by the rear of Independence Rock. Your soldiers are all mounted, and can not reach as, while we are in the mountains. An attempt to pass the Gate would be their sure destruction. So you see you have nothing to home for; and, if you are wise you will content yourself." The tavage then pointed to the shelter, and continued in the Pawnee tongue:

"This will be your place to-night. But to prevent your from doing mischief, I shall tie both your hands and feet."

together with a thong. He then said:

"You used your teeth last night. I will prevent this." He placed his victim in a sitting posture, permitting her to rest against a large stone. He then placed a long strip of bark around her neck, and attached it to the body of one of the bent saplings, thus preventing her from moving ferward Another cord was then attached to her wrists, and her arms drawn forward, extending them at full length, where they were fastened. In this painful position the poor captive must remain through the long hours of the night, unless released by some kind and daring hand. Her child was placed near her.

Wontum stretched himself upon the ground directly as rest the entrance of the wigwam, but, for a long time, did not appear to sleep. At length his heavy breathing unacunced the fact that he was unconscious.

Manonie could not move. She wished to remove a new of the twight in order that she might gaze out upon the sum in this ingreenery, but was powerless. Seeing that her by who awake, she smiled him to her side, and whit pered to him to remove the leaves, which he readily and softly did. She now had a distinct view, but in one direction. The night who a lovely one. The moon was shining brightly, but the sky was full of white, fleecy, flying clouds. As the moon passed behind them, dark shadows were thrown upon the carth, as making funtastic forms, now like the reflection of a stately oak walking over the bed of some lovely lake now like some huge giant moving along, and again like the crouthing, creeping panther, or the prowling bear.

Several times the poor girl funcied she saw the tall form of her unknown friend moving toward her, but the night-orb raising the silvery vail from before its face, revealed the fact that it was only a shadow.

Hist! What was that? She bent forward as far as it was possible for her to do so. She could not be mistaken! There, from to hind a large rock, a dark form emerged. It appeared as if surveying the ground. It moved forward cautiously, and ther crowched close to the earth. Oh, with what cagernes did Maronie watch its movements! Was this her stranger nicht? And was the hour of deliverance at hand?

It bent over one of their dusky forms. In a moment Manonie saw that a structle was going on. The savage writhed as if in agony; but gradually ceased, and all became quict. The captive then saw the stranger raise the form of the savage it his arms and disappear with him behind the rock again. She kept her eyes fixed upon the spot, and it was not long befor a flaure again appeared. But by the light of the moon she can be plainly see that the person bore the appearance and were the dress of an In lain. Still the figure moved forward with great caution.

Slowly it moved over the bodies of the sleeping savages toward the place where Manonie was contined. The form the value the front of the wigwam. The captive saw it. But Wontum by before the entrance. In a moment more a slight rustle of the brush and leaves revealed the fact that some one was removing them. The work was slowly performed.

At length part of the form, of what appeared to be an Indian, moved into the wigwam through the aperture it had made, and, taking the captive by the shoulder, drew her toward him. This revealed the fact that she was tied. It was but the work of an instant to cut the thones. Then, in a low throst inaudible tone, the stranger whispered:

"Give me the child."

"Who are you?" asked Manonic.

"A friend. Give me the child, and then follow." As the was it at to raise little Harry from his earth-couch Wontum reighbling it up on his elbow and looked around him. It was evidently but the movement of one half asleep, for, in a thort time he sunk back, and remained motionless.

After a time Manonie carefully raised her little treasure, and handed it to the stranger. Then she followed him into the open air. She could scarcely breathe, so intense was her excitement. Oh, if they should be discovered now! Her told friend would instantly become a victim. But they moved forward among the sleepers, and no one appeared to stir.

At length they had passed the circle. The rescuer moved forward more rapidly now, and Manonie followed with trem bling steps.

Not a word was spoken until they had continued their journey for at least an hour. Manonic was the first to speak.

"Oh, how can I ever repay your noble conduct in venturing so much for me?" she said.

"I have ventured but little, madam," was the brief, but kind reply.

"Oh, yes. You might have been detected, and then the savages would have killed you."

- "Very likely. But I have often ventured more in a cause not as good; besides, what is life to me, that I should fur to risk it?"
- "Life is sweet indeed. To me, oh, how dear! I would that all were as happy in living, as I."
- "I am happy in having saved you, and that I can restore yourself and child to your husband."

"May I ask to whom I owe so much?"

- "Pardon me for saying it matters but little. We have never met before. I am simply a hunter, and, having learned that you had been captured, determined to follow at 1 results you if possible. I think you are safe now."
- "But are you not going away from the fort, instead of to-

"Yes."

"I know you have good reasons for so dring; but may I ask what they are?"

"Certainly. The savages will discover your absence it a short time, though possibly not until morning. They will make the until you will take to the valid at make your way toward the fort. They will have the reason why you should go in the equation the first of the first that they will not even take the trouble to have the first that they will know that you had maintained."

"How will they know this?"

"First, they will know that you never could have released yourself. And, in the next place, they will find the body of the Indian whom I strangled."

"I saw a form emerge from behind a rock, and struggla with one of the savages."

"It was myself you saw—the same who threw you the crap of paper this morning, or, rather, yesterday morning, & 1 t must now be after midnight."

"So I supposed. And you are not an Indian, although you wear the dress of one?"

"No. I feared I might awaken some of the savages by passing over them, and I resolved to have an Indian dress. I knew if I could procure this, I might pass along unnoticed. Even if you were with me, the others would be likely to pay little attention to us, thinking me to be Wontum. I therefore approached the nearest sleeper, and fixed a firm grasp upon his throat. You saw the struggle. Well, when he was dead, I carried him behind the rock, and, removing his dress, put it upon myself."

"Was it your voice that spoke those words, 'You should have struck the blow?" "

"It was."

"And where are we going now?" .

"I am going to convey you to the cabin of Old John, the hermlt, as he is called."

" And where is that?"

"It is at the junction of the Sweetwater and Platte rivers."

"Think you I will be safe there until my husband can be apprised of my situation, and come to my rescue ?"

Your husband will probably reach that place before we do.

It was the intention to set out with a body of troops for the Swe twater, in order to intercept the band which had captured you."

"Then my husband does know into whose power I have fallen?"

Yes; and expects to save you, and punish the villain who tole you away. Had we not better pause for a short time?"

"Oh, no. With the prospect of meeting him, I never could grow weary. Let us rather quicken our pace, for I fear that wretched villain will miss me, and that he will find our trail, and start at once in pursuit. Oh, it would be dreadful if he should overtake us!"

They now continued their journey in silence, the stranger bearing the child tenderly in his arms. The sin was just rising when they began their descent of the membrain, and soon came upon a little cabin.

"This is where the hermit resides. Here you will be safe You can precede me and enter."

Manonie advanced, with little Harry, and was met at the door by one she instantly recognized. It was Mary Oakleys Both herself and mother were lavish in their cares s, but, beholding Manonie's friend, they started back in tear. There was, however, an instant lighting up in the face of Mary. She bounded forward, exclaiming, as she sprung into the arms of the powerful man:

"Quindaro! Quindaro! Is it inde-l yen! I am so happy!"

It was, indeed, that strange man who had re-cuel Manonie from a fate which, to her, appeared worse than death.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE PARADISE WON AND LOST.

Mary Oakley and her friend had not met for several months, and, of course, had much to say to each other. It would hardly be supposed that a man so stom in character, whose soul was brooding over past wrongs, and so togen according them; who was familiar with blood and so is of certor, could find leisure to talk hevingly, even if he had a heart to love. But there were times when this during more became almost a child.

Manonie, after she had reached the calin and supposed safety, found that only excitement had sustained her; and now that it had measurably passed, she sank to the ground, quite exhausted. Mrs. Oakley assisted her to a couch, and, is a short time, she was sleeping as sweetly as an infant, with little Harry nestling by her side.

Quin laro and Mary were seated upon the grass, under the shade of a large oak, and beside the beautiful spring of water already referred to. He had been explaining to her all the particulars connected with the rescue of Manonie, and his two selventures during the past few months.

"Oh, dear Walter—may I call you so? It seems so distanted wanting in affection to address you as Quindaro."

"Call me Walter, dear, if it pleases you. I have heard the name of Quindaro as only connected with deeds of blood. I love to be called as I was when a child. No living being has a lire, and the as Walter since I lost my poor parents and my lister and brothers. And when I hear your voice, with its tone; so sweet, and that name so spoken, it thrills my very side. Oh, Mary! how I wish my mission was accomplished; that my revenge was complete; that my oath had been fulfilled! How I would love to retire from the terrible scenes through which I am doomed to pass, and, in some quiet vale, live with and for you only."

"And can you not do it, dear Walter? Leave, oh, leave this herrid work for other hands. Surely you have earned rest and peace."

"No. There is one more who must fall before my hand ere I quit this truly accursed and unchristian life which it has been my sad fate to pursue for so many years."

"And that one is?"

"Wentum. I have had a hundred opportunities to kill the men ter within the past two days. But that poor woman and her child saved him."

"In what manner did she save him?"

I had find upon the dor, it would have made known my limited upon the dor, it would have made known my limited. At I then could have done nothing for poor Maria show his have been a makeawked on the spet. So I have been a makeawked on the spet. So I have been a prisoner, I came upon the Paware flend. I drew my knife, and was about to drive it to his heart. But I refrained, fearing that he might be able to give an alarm. Had the other savages been aroused,

I might have killed others as well as that brute, it is true, but they would have prevented her escape and mine. And so, for the sake of Manonie, her child, and the husband who loves them both so dearly, I consented to spare him for a time. Besides, I would not kill him while he is aslesp. But rehadies, he must know who it is that has followed him and his tribe so long, sending terror among them."

"And who is it? Pray, Walter, do tell me who you are—why you have thus pursued the Pawne's with bloody has lakenow it has been a just vengeance, or clear year well not have wreaked it; but has not the time come, my dear friend, when you can confide your secret to me?"

"At some future time, and before we are married, you shall know all. In the mean time you must content you so I with what I can tell you, and trust to my how reading booter the rest, dear Mary."

"I do trust you most implicitly, dear Walter, and it is this trust which gives a charm to my life, which ren less even the mention of your name a blessing. You have created in me a new ambition. When I met you, I could not even read or write my own name. I feared you far a time, and then I have gan to admire you. I felt how interior I was, and I be an to put forth efforts to make myself more worthy of your reacti and interest. I did not dream you would ever look up a me with eyes of love. Yet, how immeasurably dear yet in ...... Admiration soon became a bration. I was only fully happy when you were near me. The time flaw so regille that I could scarcely believe we had been an hour together, when, . on each visit, you took your leave, telling me your stay had been for several hours! Dear hours!-precias i .- as ! Why can they not last? Alas! alas! how s lish we we! And still you must be my teacher -- to bed me on and up. Her I long to give han gauge to the thoughts will be, it times, the mot suffered me with their unspector fills. -- Ab, it is only the poet, I know, who atters the esaw I ti. . . . And that has mu le me long for their treusures. In the niet. et il dis, I have tried to imagine what they would say for me, and the words came to me as if I was a pot-a male on , in lad, but still a poet; and I have preserved them i'r we a not in vanity or pride, but to prove to you how well I have predited by your instructions, as well as how truly my heart is yours."

"I am proud of you, Mary; and I shall feel repaid richly if my lessons have opened your heart and mind to the world of beauty, whose handmaiden is poetry. May I be permitted to see and read what you have written?"

"Certainly. Were they not written for you? They are yours, as the words I would have uttered had you been near." and so saying, the artless maid produced, from her bosom, a neatly-folded sheet, which she presented, with perfect unreserve, to her friend.

Quindare epened out the missive, still warm with the glew of 'hat gentle nest from which it was drawn, and read:

"The sun, how glorious and bright! Like its Divine Creator! To man the source of day and night-To earth the monitor of its dight-And life's sweet procurator. It glows and shines, how consclessly ! It gives, and gives forever ! And, like some home where angels be, Its glory ceaseth never. Beloved of my saul! I'd rather lose The light o what great glary Than that thy love should frint, or choose To wander where my eyes refuse To see thet, dear, before me. Thy love to me is life's great sun, Shining, how occarlessy! By day, by no tht, it glows the same, By day, by in the, it but its thy name-Ceasiling man it his? Dear Lord, that rulet hand and sea. Preserve for me, forever, The sun that glows for me, for me, And let it fail me, never !"

"Is it possible that you have composed this?" asked Quindaro, as he gazed upon the object of his love with his now un-1 mecaled admiration glowing upon his fine face.

" I did, Walter. It was in my heart, and I wrote it out in words."

"It is the soul of poetry. I do not say, Mary, that it will stand the test of a rigid criticism, but that it centains the true coul of poetry is quite certain. No one writes like that who has not a pure soul and mind instinctive with God's best gift -spiritual sensibility."

"Oh, Walter, how happy it makes me to hear you talk thus! I have learned the meaning of the word ambition. It appreciate the term, it seeks for great goodness; for, as I read in a book you gave me, none can be truly great without being truly good. By-the-by, Walter, I have never heard Father John speak of you, and yet I found that very book in his cacin culy yesterday. I know it was the same, for I had marked it in different places. Do you know Father John?"

"The old hermit and myself have yet to meet for the fl:

time."

"Then, why is it that I find your book upon his table !"

"He probably received it from your father."

"Oh, yes. I recollect now. My father did tell me that he lent the hermit some books. But, Walter, I wish you would see the old man. I am sure you would love him as I do."

"If I have had his character correctly represented to me, he is worthy of all regard. But you speak of ambition, Mary. Have you no desire to go into the great world where your ambition, if not fully gratified, could have a more congenial and unrestricted field?"

"I know but little of the world, and that little is only what I have gleaned from books. But it must be beautiful. I have read of the 'Garden of Elen,' where our first parents were so happy. And I have pictured to myself even a brighter seene, where intellect controls the actions of mankind. But there was a serpent in Eden. Is there any such where Christian men and women dwell?"

"There is an old adage, Mary, that there is 'no rose without its thorn." Society is not free from such serpents as carsed the beautiful garden. Alas, that it is so! Where, upon the footstool of the Creator, can be found a place more leady than that which surrounds us! Here is Nature it shows that the twick surrounds us! Here is Nature if shows that I combined, in its veriety, proched the remarkable on this globe. It is not even a normal beaut. Look around you not this globe. It is not even a normal beaut. Look around you. Do you sooth at he all valley state hims, for as the eye twen reach, toward the extern sky? See, the sin, as it appears over the mountain-peaks beyond, gives to each emerald blade a tinger of golden light, forming a picture which the hand of man could never copy, with all his skill. And look and then blushing, shrinking away before the rays of that glories orb. And here are a thousand other beauties. The mountains, the streams, and ten thousand charms no tongue or pen can describe. Yet, all these beauties are marred by the presence of strages; and blood stains the face of nature? There are many things in all parts of the world, whether in the crowled eity or in the deep forest, to mar the loveliness which abounds on every hand. It appears as if the dark demon, which reigns within man's heart, must manifest itself everywhere—everywhere!"

" Walter, I do not think I should like to reside in the great, busy, thronged world."

"We all you prefer the dangers you are compelled to en-Walter, I am not so blind that I can not see that you are stiped r to myself. I sometimes think you would not love maif you had any other to love. If I should go with you into the society you have so often painted, I fear you would be anality its itol, and then you would forget poor, uneducated Mary Oakley. I would rather live and die here, because I can then enjoy your society, which I should be deprived of, to a great extent, if we were residing where others could monopolice your tentions. It is a self-shifeeling, I know; but I can their the following might make a wound in my hear was a nathing could heal."

"Wig. Mary, I really believe you have become touched

With the ward of the jealous ancel."

"I have, and yet I can not think it wrong."

"In you the derivation of the word jatiousy?"

"I can not say that I do fully."

deal toward you?"

To be supicious implies a deal toward you?"

"No. I ball ve in your truth. If jealousy means suspicion, I shall never feel its parts toward you."

"Mary, look Hown in the valley."

The maid gazed away in the direction indicated

"Look just beyond that rocky point, near the bend of the Sweetwater."

"I see. There are horsemen approaching."

"Yes. It is the husband of Manonie, and the soldiers from the fort. Oh! how happy am I that his wife and chill are here, and will soon be restored to him. It is unaccountable to me, and I suppose it is only natural sympathy, but every time I have heard that girl speak, it has thrilled me to to the like a dream almost forgotten. But see. The soldiers are dashing forward at a rapid rate. No doubt Marshall expects to find his wife and child here. Well, let him come, for happiness awaits him."

"Shall I awake Manonie?"

"Perhaps it would be best. I first thought I would permit him to approach and let his wife find him standing by her bedside when she awoke. But so sudden a joy might overcome her. Wake her, and let have see the approach of the party."

" Mary, your father is with the soldiers. Do you not wish to see him?"

"Oh! yes. He will be here soon."

"He will be with us in half an hour."

At this moment Manonie came bounding forward, and exclaiming:

"Oh! look down in the valley. Our friends are coming

We shall all have such a happy meeting!"

These words had scarcely been uttered, when a number of savages sprung from concealment from behind the adjoining rocks. Quindaro was seized by a dozen powerful Indians, und despite his struggles—which were the most desperate—he was bound hand and foot. Poor Manonie was again a prisoner, as was also the friend who had risked so much for her rescue. Mary Oakley was also bound, but not so with her mother. Poor old Mrs. Oakley was stricken down by the relentless tomahawk, thus freeing her pure spirit and adding to that throng above another angel.

Wontum had discovered the escape of Manonie but a few he us after her departure, and, searching for the train contrary to the expectations of Quindaro, had started in parsuit. He reached the cabin of the hermit a short time after our friends had arrived. But there was a kind of superstitious awe which prevented the savage from advancing at once and seizing his victims. While the lovers were conversing together the us is a of danger, the eyes of the Pawnee were glaring up at them with the deadly hate of the rattlesnake. He recognized the terrible man who had so long sent death and terre the most guarant. He knew he was the rescuer of Manonic, and that the savage found near the rock had been killed by his hand. He even wore his dress at that moment.

He also saw the troops in the valley as they were approaching. Now was the time for complete vengeance!

Word im scated himself upon the ground by the side of his Victims, and grazed upon them with a malignant smile. He then pointed to the troops and said:

"Unite dogs. Your friends come. You want to go with them?

Quin haro made no reply. He saw that the savage meant mis his it and to irritate him would only be to render their sit at an a reterrible. As for himself, he chafed like a caged tizer, but, i'r the sake of the females, he restrained himself.

He raw lup on Manonie. Her eyes were moist. But she classed her lay closely to her heart, while her gaze was easily and her lay upon the valley and her friends. Still, she could have her lay little from these, as the Indian saw them, and containly would not await their approach. Mary Oakley was almost transic with grief. She sat beside the body of her mark relimether, solving and mouning. It was a scene to melt a heart of iron, but the savage only gloated over the wretche iness of those around him.

But he could not delay long. He, therefore, gave orders to an advance, and the during Quindaro, Manonic, her child and Mary Oakley, bound and helpless, were forced along over the ranged me intains toward Devil's Gate, the stronghold of the Pawness, and that, too, just as liberty and happiness ar peared to be almost within their grasp.

- 1

CHAPTER IX.

TOO LATE.

The heart of Lieutenant Marshall throbbed with joy as he gazed upon the noble band by which he was surrounded, and contemplated the mission upon which he was engaged—the rescue of his dear wife and child. He never before had felt the pangs of a personal anguish. His life had been one round of happy days—almost without a cloud. Since his marriage he had felt some uneasiness with regard to his wife and child, but had never dreamed that any personal harm could beful them, surrounded as they were by those ever ready to give even their lives in their defense.

When he found she had been captured, even in the fort, the blow was a heavy one. Indeed, it almost crushed the strong man. But, he rallied when he found it necessary to put forth personal effort for the recovery of his prize. He was now bent upon a daring enterprise. The object was sufficient to nerve the heart of any man. And he telt confidence in its success. So he dashed forward at a rapid rate.

Twice their guide, Oakley, fancied that he saw savages upon the Black Hills. A halt was made and a there is search instituted. But, without avail; and this it was that resulted so unfortunately for Quinclaro and his friends. Had these delays not have occurred, there would have been a happy a min of loved ones. But, this was not to be:

"I see no signs of the savages," did Marshall, "and yet we approaching the Sweetwater. Oh! my God! If we should not intercept them, what will be the result!"

Byhtin' to do," unswered Oakley.

"We will be compelled to attack them at the Gate, I suppose."

" Jes' so."

&quot;And I fear such an attack would be fruitlesa."

"I thought soldiers had no fear!" replied Oakley, as he gaze! into the eyes of Marshall.

- "I have no personal fear. My fear is for them, and for these moble men who are with me. I would leap into the most of a cannon, if it became necessary, to rescue them. But I can not lead my men there. I must act in a rational tannor. Each life here is valuable, and I must not permomy personal feelings to overbal mee my judgment. I shall a till I can; but, when that is done, if any desperate adventions is required. I shall attempt it alone."
  - "No you won't, by a stockin' fall!"

" What do you mean, Mr. Oakley?"

"Jack Oakley, I sloose you mean. I mear Just this. If you go among the Injuns, you don't go alone, by two stock-in's full."

"Who will prevent it?"

"A man just about my size; nothin' shorter."

"You'll prevent it?"

"Myself, and no mistake!"

- "Oh, I understand. You purpose to share my danger. But, remember, Oakley, you have a wife and child. You should think of them."
- "So I do, all the time. An' it's because I think of them that I had so much for you. But they are safe up at old Father John's. Lord, if they wasn't, I don't know what I think I should go mad, if any thing should happen to wife an' Molly."

"De you not her for their safety during your absence?"

"Oh, Has you, no. A red would not go near Old . ohn's."

" Why not?"

prayin', an' sich, an' the reds keep away. But, the old man is some after all. Lord, he smashed my bones in a dozen pieces, t'other day."

"You didn't quarrel with him?"

Lerl, but I was facial! He chucked me about forty feet up in the air, an' I dish't think I weighed half so much, until I lit. Jimminy, I fold as if any one would have to take a fine-tooth comb to scrape all my parts together. But, it is very strange we haven't heard any thing from him. You may just bet he's after Wontum, sharp."

"Did you not say that Quindaro was also upon the trail of the savages?"

"I did. An' between him an' the old man, I feel confident that things will be all right."

Poor Jack Oakley! He little dreamed that at that moment his wife was but a few rods from him, cold in death: that his daughter was a prisoner in the hands of the relentless Wontum!

The troops had reached the foot of the hill. Marshall and Oakley dismounted and commenced its ascent.

"If they are here, it is strange they have not seen us," said

"It is strange," replied Oakley, and a look of apprehension settled upon his face.

They reached the flat upon which the cabin stood. Oakley started back as his eyes fell upon the mangled form of his wife. For some moments he did not speak, but stood as extricken dumb. Then a wild cry broke from his lips, and he fell across the body of his murdered wite. Marshall raised him up, but found that he was entirely insensible. However, by the application of water, which he dipped from the allignment spring, he was finally restored to consciousness, but his wails were heart-rending.

When he had become in a measure calm, Marshall said:

"The savages have just left this place. This deed has just been committed, for the body is yet warm. So come, Oakley, arouse yourself. We have work yet to perform."

The old man started up and gazed around him. His nun ner had become more calm, but he called upon his district in an earnest manner. But there was no response. He then began to search around. After a time, he said:

"It is evid 'ly at -ut, can you distinguish the faterium of any female'

"Distinctly Here is that of my own child, Molly. Also

"Is there any thing that resembles that of a child?"

"Yes. Here is a small one, close to the door of the cabin."

"It is my boy, Harry," exclaimed Marshall, as he pressed his hand to his brow. "Which direction have they taken?"

"Over the mountain, toward Devil's Gate."

We can not overtake them, for they must have had an cour's start, and our horses can not travel on these roush hills. Let us take to the valley at once, and make an attack upon the cave. That is our only course."

"And that is a langerous one, although it must be tried."

Onking and Mushall now returned to the spot where the body's were whith r. But their hearts were heavy. An explanation was soon given, and there was not a sooner bresh, who did not clutch his sword and inwardly you to be terribly reverged for the misery which the blood stoned human tigers had caused.

They crossed the Platte, and to k their course up they I bey at the Sweetwater. After a time they actived at or near tile Rocky Pass which was held by the saviges. As the situation was such that a charge could not be made, Marthall paneed to devise some means for a successful attack.

CHAPTER X.

THE MEUNTAIN WOLF'S DASH FOR LIBERTY.

Poss Manable was upable to walk. The fatigue of the talk is loved to invest the number of the talk is loved to much for her. And hope had its come alm as containty. Even her husband was in side to we had been added by a containty. But, she still had hop area below that this year a girl could be so recolded, her manner delta that this year a girl could be so recolded, her manner delta in heate the slightest tear; the was even definit, as it became Jack Oakley's daughter, and Quindaro's affirmed.

A litter was formed to expente her removal, upon which Manonie was placed. As they progressed, she addressed her self to Wontum, asking, in the Indian language:

"What are your intentions with regard to your prisoners?"

"To make you my wife!" returned the savage, "and to take my revenge on that enemy of my race," seowling furiously at Quindaro.

" And Mary Oakley ?"

" Give her to the chief."

" And Quindaro?"

" Burn! burn! BURN I"

- "You dare not burn him! Such a crime would be retained by the extermination of the entire Pawnee race."
- "Ay, but I will. As soon as we reach the cave, I will show you a pleasant sight. He shall be roasted alive, even before old Nemona can interfere."
- "Monster!" hissed Manonie, with a shudder. She then cast a pitying glance at Quindaro. He was unmoved as if he had not understood the Indian's threat.
- "You need not fear for me, Manonie," he said. "I shall find some plan to foil this villain yet."
  - "Did you understand what we were saying?"
  - "Yes, the Pawnee language is familiar to me."
- "But, I fear the wretch will put his threat into immediate execution. Do you think the troops can make a successful attack upon the Gate?"
  - "We will hope for the best, at all events."
  - " What threats did Wontum make?" asked Mary.
  - " That he would bu-"
  - "Hush!" Not a word.
  - "Oh! don't be afraid to speak. Tell me the worst."
- "Me tell," said Wontum. "Me burn white boy. Roas him! Ugh!"

Mary gave the savage such a look that he actually started back. She then replied:

- You won't. Or if you do, it would be better for you thus you had never been born." There was an earnestness in her tone which plainly indicated that she methal just what the taid, whatever might be her ability to avenge the act.
- "Ugh! what would pale squaw do? She only woman, an' woman only squaw?"

* I would kill you, you hideous villain. I would give your soul to the Evil Spirits to be forever tormented!"

The Indian laughed as if in derision. But, it was evident that he was not altogether free from fear, for he avoided her during the remainder of the journey, although the girl had no weapon so far as he could see. Her threat of invisible powers had filled him with misgivings.

It was nearly dark when the party arrived at Devil's Gate They found much excitement prevailing. The Indians were ready for action, being concealed behind trees and rocks, and in the various caves along the narrow passage forming the "Gate." The troops which started up the valley had arrived, and already had commenced throwing solid shot and shrapnell among the rocks, but with little effect.

The savages were few in number. The arrival of Wontum and his warriors gave them fresh courage. There was a war going on at that time between the Pawnees and their natural enemy, the Sioux. This had but recently commenced, but it heldrawn away from the mountain a large number of the Pawnee warriors. The chief, Nemona, had been detained at the Gate by sickness. He was anxious to negotiate a peace with the whites, in order to turn his entire attention to the Sioux; but, many of the braves, who had learned of the shughter of their brethren at Laramie Peak, opposed this.

The arrival of Wontum only strengthened this feeling. He had started for the fort with two hundred warriors, and had returned with less than seventy. True, they had four prisoners, but not a single scalp. Some had been taken at Laramie, to they were lost in the fight which occurred soon after.

Dirkless came on. The prisoners were placed in one of the same ledosely guarded. Soon the savages ascertained of the irro, or the "Mountain Devil," as they called him, as the of their captives. Their delight was great. They have a least saig, and yelled like madmen. They gathered them I the cave where he was confined, and gazed curiously at the near who had been such a terror to them, and who and so long escaped capture.

A consultation was hell. Manonie heard many of the words spoken, and turning to Quindaro, she said:

"Oh, my dear friend, I fear there is little hope for you"

"I hear their conversation, Manonie. But, I am not without hope. I think I can outwit them yet."

"What are they saying, Walter?" askel Mary Oakley.

"I suppose you will know soon. Perhaps I might as well tell you at once."

"Oh! tell me the worst, Walter, lear, do. I am pre-

"They have resolved to burn me alive."

"Oh! heaven help us," exclaimed the girl, as she clung to her lover. "But, perhaps our friends will make an assault in the morning and wew ill be rescued. Let us hope so, at least."

"They will not wait until morning. They are guthering material now for the fire. Mary, can you break the cord which binds my hands?"

She made the attempt, but it was a fruitless one.

At this moment Wontum entered the cave followed by half a dozen powerful savages. The villain fixed his smake-like eyes upon Quindaro, and then said:

" [' da! you kill Indian much. Must die now, like dog Must burn."

" I understand."

" Barn !"

I heard your very interesting conversation with restitutions. As for myself, I have little to live for Yes, May," he continued, as he saw the look of ageny which statical upon the face of his beloved, "I understand your manning, and I will confess that I have need to live for while you are with me. And I feel that we shall yet be face and happy."

Wontum pointed to a bright fire which had been blazing at the entrance of the cave; then to a large heap of light grashwood a short distance beyond. He added:

"Roast you here."

Quindaro comprehended his meaning. He was to be secured in the cave as in an oven, and literally rous'd alive. The thought was a horrible one. But why was it material? If that rock was to be his tomb, would he not rest as sweetly there, after the death-pangs were over, as in any other place? Who would there be but Mary Oakley to drop a tear upon the lonely grave in the bright valley, even were he permitted to make it his laly's last resting-place?

But what would be the fate of Mary? Would she be spared by the savages? What the face of Manonie and her child? Would it not be worse than death? He felt sare they would not be compelled to share his fate. But the thought and they were to be 12 with a term his probation, out of Ein a pant, although he bit could bent of the addingte species ". Le trongs who were now bell rethe Gate. Quindaro tray 1. 1 Mary Oakley, and his have bad already to be out in an the enterior to and the posting mother and ber Call. But, where some union a nevent transport, an heur er two would did in the late. A research to read seatcely hope for. If he could only be to for a si, it constit, even the wall he was well of the part of any his in a would make a most desperate effect to example. The early hope, and this was searcely a hope, was thirt, unseen by the savages, he mights according to mains the greathons which bound his wrise,

Austing thought appeared to cross his mind at that moment. Turning to Wontum, he asked:

- "What are you going to do with Manonie?"
- "Make her Wontum's squaw!"
- "And the child?"
- "He brave. Maker of warrior. Live with Ingenstill get big."
- "What are you ming to do with the other pale maiden?"
- "Give her to chief."
- "Where is your chief?"
- "Thee" West in mallest importion his her up the rocks.
- "Tell the chief the prismer wishes to see him."
- "Ugh! no! You must die now."
- "Will is is a consideration of the director and even show Quindare the chief."

The many start I, drew his knife, and sprung forward toward Q is less. But he period as he saw his prisoner did bottom. The fire was their a so beliefly that each could be the reason of his enemy, and the savale we dd not have the large mater the boil man before han, had he been unbeaut. Alternative pateral characters fine, Q independen-when he is plained. If you are brave, unloose my hands."

"Wontum brave! Wontum no coward."

"Then unbind me."

" Ugh! No!"

"You fear me! You dure not set me free, even for a moment, although you are surrounded by your warriors. Your chief would not do this!"

Wontum turned to his men and gave some directions. In moment four powerful savages entered the cave and solved the females, making a movement toward the open air, while cthers began to bring the brushwood nearer the fire.

Miss Oakley set up the most pitiful wails, as she structed to reach her lover. But, it was of no avail. Manonie was more calm, but an agonized expression settled upon her face.

Old Nemona approached at this moment. He was accompanied by his wife. He looked upon Mary Oakley with something like pity in his expression, and then turned an anary gaze upon Wontum. The squaw, or chief's wife, who was called Topeka, (which term signifies "lovely island," or "beautiful gem,") approached Miss Oakley, and made an effort to comfort her but to no purpose, as she only struzgled the more, and her shricks became more heart-rending.

Even the chief did not appear to fully understand the natter. But it was all explained when his eyes fell upon Quintaro, and the preparations which were being made to item some prisoner. Nemona was not a cruel man. On the contrary, he was quite generous for a savage. But, he knew Quin laro, and the injury he had inflicted upon his true. That is, he knew him as a mount in rover, and a truer to list urriors. He had considerable dread of him, which was not a ditagether unmingled with super titism. Still, he had a him to be human, while others declared there was not a the supernatural about the during enemy of their race.

But, even this impression, which prevail the cely and extendences innorant of the tribe, we dispelled to a great steat, a, a meeting him face to five, bound and helple's.

ing toward Quindaro.

" Yes!" was the response.

At this the savages set up the cost uncarthly howlings, and began to dence in a frantic matter. They had so long feared the prisoner, that when they felt that they were about to be relieved of a terrible for, their joy was supreme.

When quiet was comparatively restored, Quindaro said:

"Nemona is a great chief."

- "Ugh! Nemona is Pawnee, head chief."
- " He does not fear, like a woman."

" No. Nemona fears nothing."

"Your prisoner is bound. He wishes to embrace his sis-

" Ugh !"

" You say your prisoner has no weapon."

" Ugh!"

A large log was now brought into the cave and placed upon the ground. Quindaro was forced to sit upon it, and Wontura, as if to make his revenge the more complete, bandared the eyes of his victim. The females were then forcibly dragged from the cave.

- "Is the chief here?" asked the captive.
- "He is," was the reply.
- " Do you hear the cries of the women ?"

" Ugh !"

"If you do not wish me to think you are a woman you will release me until I can bil them farewell. If you do not, I shall think you fear me. Are you, with all your warriors, afraid of me, even if I am unbound?"

" No P

"Then show that you are not, by releasing my hands."

This appeal was to the pride of the savage, and not his humanity. Topeka also heard the words; and, whether it was from sympathy and a desire to permit the victim to escape, of house defilt a pride that her husband should appear brave as he really was, must be conjectured. At all events, she said:

"The chief does not fear. He will release Quindaro and permit him to embrace his frict is before he dies."

As she spoke these words, she a lyance I and drew a glittermg blade from her bosom, and severed the then is. She then a id:

"You are good. The pale free world call you to notice.

I'm my hadred red you meet not how him."

Quin i are did not for a moment compacher. I the meming of these words, nor did he afterward feel fully satisfied upon that point. If he interpreted them correctly, it was an unusual in stance of trust. But, after severing the cords, Topeka, either by forgetfulness or design, dropped the knife before him! He covered it with his foot, at once.

Quindaro was astounded. This had escaped the notice of the savages. He was sorry that she had done so. It is a really deprived him of one-half his power, where it miss have been intended to increase it. The chief was standing directly before him, and must be the first one checant of the could not now injure him. Had the knife net have been left, he might have done so, but Topeka evidently had trusted his honor, and she should not be deceived, even if his own life was to be sacrificed in congequence.

The prisoner remained scated, pretending in liference. The chief wished to appear equally so, and turned away.

Topeka entered, leading Manonie and Miss Oakley. They both spring to the side of the captive, and keeeling, sobbed as if their hearts would break.

"Hush!" whispered Quindaro. "I must speak briefly. Manonie, leave the cave at once; I am about to make a dash for liberty."

She slowly raised herself, and was passing toward the entrance. Mary had heard the words, and she chang to him, while her sobs became less violent, and a kind of smile lighted up her face.

"Oh, you will succeed?" she whispered, still not knowing what means he was to use to secure his escape—so truly did she rely upon his word.

"Can you keep your courage up until I can return with the soldiers and rescue you?"

"Oh, yes; I can endure any thing if you are safe. They will not kill us, and while we live there is always here"

"Then I will make the attempt here. God bless you!"
Quindaro sprung to his feet.

Manonie had been watching him, and awaiting that movement. The instant she saw that he was ready, she threw her arms around the chief, and ching to him with all her strength, at the same time exclaiming, in frantic tones:

"Oh, spare Quindaro! spare Lim, good Nemona-my Indian

The prisoner comprehended her intentions in an instant The chief struggled to throw off Manonie, but did not succeed in releasing himself until it was too Lte.

Quin laro sprung, like a lion, past the spot. He struck at Wontum, but that wily and ever-ready savage avoided the blow, to a great extent. He was only slightly wounded.

The movement was so sudden that, before the warriors around were aware of it, he was outside the cave and beyond their immediate reach. Still, he was not yet free, as he well know. He was at the upper end of the "Gate," and could be the pass through that, as he would be compelled to encounter through that, as he would be compelled to encounter through the every hand. He could not pause an instant for reflection, as the pursuit had already commenced in carnest. Up the rugged hills he sprung, for among the rocks lay his only hope. He was but a few rods in the advance, and much of the time in plain view of his pursuers. He still wore the Indian costume, and darted among the warriors stationed higher up. These did not molest him, looking elsewhere, as they were, for the cause of the exchanent, and thinking Quindaro one of their own tribe. This saved him.

Wontum was quite as flect of foot as Quindaro. The latter was flying for life and liberty, while the former was urged on by his leatred and baffled revenge. He had sent a shot after his foe, but it was ineffectual. However, he finally succeeded in making those further up the mountain understand who it was that he was pursuing.

Quin irro at length reached an open space. Just beyond he saw a line, which plainly showed him that all escape, in the direction, was impossible. Behind him came his yelling, infinited facts. Before him was a wall of ritles. To the tight, an almost perpendicular precipice, and to the left, a mass of rugged rocks, and a thick, stunted undergrowth.

This latter was his most likely cover, and he darted in that direction. A dozen shots were sent after him, but he escaped any serious injury, by reason of running in a zig-zag course. This movement lessened his speed, and, when he sprung are not the friendly rocks, his enemies were not a dozen rods behind him.

The passage became difficult; but it was equally so for pursuers and pursued. At length Quindaro came upon a ravine, which wound its way down toward the base of the hill. He judged, from its direction, that it must connect with the Sweetwater below the Gate.

Hearing no sound to break the stillness of the night, he began to think the pursuit had been abandoned. He monuted the bank of the ravine and gazed toward the river. In the clear moonlight, he could see horsemen in the valley. They were not five hundred yards distant, and appeared to be working their way slowly up the mountain. A little to the front of this was a line of infantry, or dismounted cavalry.

While he stood thus partially exposed, he heard a sharp click near him, like the cocking of a rifle. Quick as thought, he sprung back into the ravine, and, with the same breath, the report came.

Another dusky form arose close by his side. A tomahawk whizzed past his head, but he escaped by a sudden "dask." It was evident this savage's piece was not loaded. He expected to feel the ball enter his flesh, but, instead of this, he hear i the rapid steps of his foes in pursuit.

A little further on, he stumbled and fell. He was aware that he had encountered some human being. Quick as thought he sprung to his feet. Perhaps the dozen forms, which he saw, at a glance, prostrated upon the ground, were Uniod States troops, awaiting in concealment, the savages. If so, he must quickly make himself known, or he would be dispatched, as he had not yet removed his Indian dress, which was worn over his other, and of course he would be mist for a savage. But should they be Indians in and should be watching those below, he must not speak too quickly, as listing those and dress might create confusion, and yet taver his care perhaps.

But he soon became satisfied with regard to the character of those he had encountered, for they sprung up with and reds. The unceremonious manner of Quinduro's approximate in the ride-shot so near, apprised those laying in want that instance of an Ir lime confirmation. Perhaps it was a Sioux spy! This, probably, was that an appreciation, for Wontum, and some dozen others, who can be rushing up at that instant, were received with a dollar war-whoop. But, before any blows had been struck, they me grant each where and explanations were made.

Instant search was made for Quindaro, but he was nowhere to be found. He had taken advantage of the confusion, and slipped away unperceived. The mountain-wolf was free again! Wontum was almost frantic with rage. But he soon from I something class to occupy his attention.

The yells of the savages and the report of the rifle had been heard by the troops near the river. The flash and the burling specke assisted their aim. The booming of a cannot be been where Wontum was standing. Another followed this, and then another. This would prevent all further search for the ficitive. So the savages withdrew to a safer place, while the half of the cape of Quindaro, and, so far as he could judge by their movements, the intentions of the troops.

He found Nom an in a bad humor, and more than ever determined to treat for a peace with the commander of the Federal forces. But the opposition of his warriors was still very strong, owing, in a great extent, to the influence of the man whose personal plans were of more apportance to himself than the shedding of blood, or friendly intercourse and trade between his tribe and the whites.

CHAPTER XI.

THE DAY BREAKING.

In a 5 wm ments after the arrival of Wontum at the chief of a trip on the way is a contact which amounted almost to a description of the chief of th

Mis Outley saw him at the same time, and, springing for ward, cried:

"Oh, Father John, are you, too, a prisoner?"

It was indeed the old hermit, and he replied in a mild voice:

" No, my child, not a prisoner."

." Then why are you here?"

- "I came to effect the release of yourself, Manonie, as she is called, and her child."
- Release as!" cried both the captives, as they clang to the "Release her?" asked Wontum, as he pointed to Manania

"I did not address you, sir," said the hermit, in a stern voice. "When I am through speaking with these por captives, I will confer with Nemona, the chief."

This reply stung the wily Indian, who had no alternative, however, but to remain quiet.

- "Dill you see Quindaro?" asked Mary, betraying her emb-
  - "He is safe."

"And my husband?" chimed in Manorie.

"He is with the troops in the valley, and will soon be with you."

"You are spy!" yelled Wontum.

"Are you spy?" asked the chief.

"No, I am neither warrior nor spy. My trade is not blood but peace."

"Where were you taken?"

- "I was seized by your warriors in the ravine but a short distance from the river."
  - "What were you doing there?"

"On my way to you to propose peace."

The face of the chief lighted up as he heard these words but that of Wontum grew as black as midnight.

- 'What conditions," asked Nemons, "are you prepared to
- That you cease all further depredations, release these captives, and give up Wontum for execution. He was the leader of this outbreak. You need not frown upon my so teredly, he continued addressing Wontum, "I am sumply deliceting my message. The chief can return just such an answer at pleases him. I will bear it faithfully. But I trust there will be no necessity for further bloodshed. You know I have always been a man of peace, Nemona, and I would counsel you for your good. You can not meet the white warriors, as they outnumber you, and have great guns to fight with. Let me return with the captives."

Topeka now came up. She took the old man by the hand and gazed earnestly into his face, and then she asked:

' Are you Father John, the hermit?"

"So I am called, Topeka."

"The good old man whose wigwam is upon the mountain side by the Medicine Bow."

" My cabin is there."

"And do you live alone? Are you a hermit, with none to share your cabin—no one to love you?"

" I trust that there are some who love me. At least, I hope that I have not the enmity of any one."

"Oh, no. No one could be an enemy to you, and every-body loves you because you teach them of the Great Spirit. If they would all learn of you, I think we should have no wars. Will you teach me of that Being who rules in the sky?"

"Willingly, Topeka. He teaches us that we must not murder. Now, when some of your tribe were last at my cabin, they murdered a poor woman. It was the mother of Mary Oakley."

"Of that poor captive?"

" Yes."

"And has it left her no one to love?"

"Her father is yet alive."

" No one else?"

"Oh, yes," exclaimed Mary, with zealous simplicity, "there is one other. There is more than one. Father John is one; and another is the one you—"

"Hush!" whispered the hermit.

And do you love him?"

"I do," was the ready answer.

"As much as I love my husband, Nemena?"

"I think quite as much," she replied, smiling and blushing.

"Then you shall be sent to him. Who was it killed your mother?"

- "I think it was Wontum," returned the hermit.
- "You are a bad man," replied Topeka, in a sharp tone, as the turned upon the villain. "You shall be punished." Then turning to Manonie, she said:

"You did not love to live in the wigwarn?"

- "No, I did not, Topeka," was the reply. "It was not my home. It was the Indian's lodge, not the white man's home, and I am not an Indian."
- "Well, you are a pale-face, and should live with them. And you could not love Wontum?"

"No," was the decided answer. "I would as soon think of loving a prairie-wolf."

"And I do not blame you, for he is a bad man. Who have you to love there?" She pointed toward the troop.

"I have a husband there, whom I love, and who is waiting for me and his child."

"Then you shall go to him."

"She shall not go," cried Wontum in an emphatic manner. And he drew his huge knife, as if to oppose any attempt to take her away.

"Stand back, Wontum," exclaimed the chief, in a determined voice. "I order here."

Wontum, while he feared to disobey, still had he per that he could divide the tribe, and that the largest portion of them would be for war. So he commenced a conversation, in a low tone, with the different groups standing around, which was either unheard or unheeded by the chief.

Topeka gazed earne tly upon Mary for some time, and then spoke, more as if giving utterance to her own thoughts, than addressing another:

"So that bad man murdered your poor mother."

"Yes," replied Mary, as she clung to the breast of the ol man, sobbing.

" How long ago?

"Only yesterday."

"Only yesterday? Let me sen. It is reteen years since that bad man killed--" She paused as if nowing.

"Killed who?" asked the old hermit, exhibiting soms emotion.

" Killed the mother of Manonis!"

The poor captive shuddered as she heard this announcement. The old man was still more excited, and he cried:

"What was the name? Where did she live?"

- "I have forgotten," answered Topeka. "But my habend
  - " Was he there?

"Where?"

" On the spot where this other murder was committed?"

- "No," replied the chief. "I was at Willow Lake, and knew nothing of the occurrence until the return of Wontum, He brought Manonie with him. She was then a little child about three years of age."
  - "What was her name?"

" I never knew."

"Where was the place where the murder was committed?"

"It was in Iowa, near-"

This sentence was broken. A sharp rine-crack was followed by the chief starting to his feet and placing his hand upon his head as if in pain. Then a crimson liquid oozed between his fingers, and he staggered and fell to the ground.

Topeka sprung ferward with a wild shrick, and threw herself upon the body of her husband, calling loudly upon him to look up or speak to her. But he was silent. For some time she gave vent to the most pitiful moans, but at length she sprung to her feet.

Wentum and nearly a hundred Indians had gathered around and were grazing upon the chief. The wife confronted the villam with a drawn dagger, and exclaimed:

" Fou did that !"

"Ugh! Me! No!" exclaimed Wontum, evidently sur trised at the accusation.

"Did to do it?" asked the frantic wife, turning to the hermit.

"I think not, Manonie. You se that the morning has down I, and that it is quite light. Some of the soldiers have topt near enough to take a deadly aim, and have done this out, let me see if Nemona is killed or budly hurt.' The old man tent over him, examined the hurt, and then said:

"Do not fear, Topeka. Your husband is not badly in-but has not broken the skull. He is merely rendered insensible by the blow, but will recover in a short time."

By the direction of Topeka the savages removed the chief into one of the caves where he would be safe from the shot which now began to fall round them very rapidly.

Now was the time for Wontum's triumph. The chief was usensible, and could not countermand his orders, and he knew the savages were willing to fight under him. And he Lought they could withstand the assault a number of hours, e on if they were defeated at all. So the conspirator assumed command, and the almost incessant cracking rifle and the war of musketry and field-pieces, told the story that the work had commenced in earnest.

Occasional yells were also heard, some of them speaking of defeat or success alternately. Many of the savages were concentrated near the place where our friends were standing, and it became very dangerous for them to remain. The old hermit saw that it would be still more dangerous to attempt to pass to their friends, as they would be seen by the savages; and if they, by any miracle, escaped the fire of their own troops, the Indians would shoot them down sooner than they should escape. This he felt sure Wontum would do.

He therefore led the females into the cave where the chief had been placed. Here they would be safe, unless Wentum, finding himself liable to be defeated, should enter an 1 massacre them all. But this risk it was necessary for them to run.

The two captive females were in a state of terrible excitement. Oh! if their friends should be defeated! And now that liberty appeared so near, oh! if it should only be the liberty of death! And that, too, without even being permitted a parting word with their beloved ones!

Topeka was calm. She asked many questions in regard to the mode of life in the great world, and evinced much interest, but confessed that she had but little desire for change, unless her husband should prefer such a life, which was not probable.

Nemona had recovered so far as to be able to speak. His wife showed him every attention, manifesting the greatest tenderness and love. Upon a sudden, she caught Father John, and in a hurried manner said:

- " Quick! Conceal yourself behind me."
- " Wontum is coming?"
- " Yes."
- " I will oppose him."
- "Madman. He has a dozen powerful warriors with him, and they are all well armed, and you have nothing You would be killed before you could utter two words."
  - "It is Manonie the villain is after."
  - " Yes."
  - " And shall I not defend her while I have life? I will."
- "Then you can not help her now, or at any future timeCome." The wife of the chief drew the old man back, and screened him from sight.

At this moment Wontum entered the cave, followed by a party of tierce warriors, who were yelling in a frantic manner. Poor Manonie felt that she was the intended victim, and shrunk to the most obscure part of the cavern. But, it was of no avail. She was dragged forth, while her shricks fibed the air with their echoes. In vain she called upon her husband for assistance. He was not there.

And yet once she thought she heard his voice ringing across the mountain; still, she was not sure, as it was blended with a hundred others.

"My child! My child! Give me my boy!" But the

"Oh! this is too much!" cried the old man, and springing from his concealment, he added:

"This is too cowardly."

1

He reached the entrance of the cave just in time to see Wontum place his captive upon a horse. Then he felt a sharp pang, and fell back helpless and senseless to the ground

"I knew this would be the result!" cried Topeka, as she should to his side. "Rash old man—what could be think to accomplish against so many."

Miss Oakley had reached him at the same time. There was blood upon his face, indeed it was covered, showing that the wound was there.

"Dear Topeka," said Mary, "your husband requires all your attentions. I will do all I can for poor old Father John, but I fear that will be but little."

"We shall have—or rather you will have antistance in a few moments. Don't you have that the thing has nearly ceased? And see; just at the first of the hill are the troops. Will they harm me or my husband?" asked the Indian wife, with much solicitude.

"No. Do not fear. You saved Quin hare, and would have naved ourselves. You shall ever be our friends."

Little Harry Mar-hall had been left behind in the cuve, Wontum seeing that he had barely time to escape with Manonie.

CHAPTER XII.

REUNION.

After the wife of poor old Jack Oald y had been placed in a temporary grave, the almost heart-linken hashard followed Marshall until they had rejoined that to be join the valley. They then took their way up the Sweetant r. They were well satisfied that Devil's Gate we like the place decided upon by the savages as their stronglish. How many warriors they would be compelled to enour rows not haven, but, it was supposed that at lost two-tairds of their tribe had gone upon an incursion against the Sanay who we had prorters was near the junction of Pole creak and the south fork of the Platte river. Yet, even though their norms were but small, they could hold the Gate against a large force, if they were determined so to do. As they near a the mornalin testings, Marchall asked:

"Othley, do you not think that Non-samily his with ut a first, when he sees with what a first he will have to contend?"

"Wal, my 'pinion is, that he would never a min need aghtin' of it hadn't been for that villainers so main! Won-turn. I tell ye, cap'n, he's about the world spoke in not a relating that can be scart up in any of the Nobr sha tribes. I thought that was some mean 'uns down san no the Slove, but this feller takes the ray clean off the bush, and no mistake."

"Do you think it was Wontum who killed your poor wife?"

"I think it was. But what on earth he wanted to do that for, is more not me can tell. Why, cap'n, she was the peace-allest critter yen ever did see. An' she was a good Christian women, too, an' that's some consolation. But I tell you cap'n, for all that, it's left a big hole in this old heart, as can never be filled up."

"I appreciate your feelings, Mr. Oakley," said Marshall.

myself. Why, exp'n, when I got up thar', an' my eyes fell on that form—that poor old woman what's been sich a true wife to me for more than twenty years, I felt jest as if my heart all at one stopped leatin', an' that my blood froze rite up in try wins. I'm what on earth did the villain want with my little Molly?"

. I. . . . deir custem to take captive every one they don't kill ?"

When they go into an enemy's country, they generally do, but we've lived peaceably down by the Medicine faw tora good many years, an' we never have given 'emany cause to meddle with us."

fort with me."

"Shouldn't wonder if he had. But I can't help it. I fold it was my duty to go, and when I keep I have a duty helpe the, I magning to try an' do it, whatever may be the up hot. An' I've got a hig 'un before me now. I'm pen' to kel that Wontum."

"There are others who have an equal chim up a his lift."

"Perhaps you think you have, cap'n, but yourst recled that hain't killed your will an' cill lyet."

"I hope not?" said Mursh. dl, with a start in.

"Oh, he's got no call to do that."

"I know that, as he can be a her, alive. But,

"I have that, as he can be a her, alive. But,

"I have her restored to me?"

"I take not. He will attend to his own safety first."

"But he might kill his victims and then escape."

"No. If he don't injure them, he will only be killed! If he does, he will be tortured. That will be some inducement.

For he knows that he would be hunted the world over."

"Is it not strange that we have not seen Quindaro?"

"Wal, I think that is a little strange. I am atraid he was taken prisoner the same time the wife was killed. If this was o, Wontum wouldn't let him live two hours, and that would break Molly's heart. But what is your plan of attack cap'n?"

"I can not tell until I can learn something of the position the savages hold. I think, however, I shall pass around In the pendence Rock, with a portion of our force, while we attack with our artillery in front. I shall also place men on each flank to prevent the Indians from escaping. Still, this will depend upon circumstances, and the number of the enemy."

"Wal, we'll have a chance to begin soon, for there is the Gate."

The troops now approached the stronghold. The report of a rifle, and the wounding of one of the men, was such their evidence that the savages were prepared for them. The artillery was at once brought into position, and a number of shot were thrown among the rocks.

But darkness was coming on, and the firing was kept up only at long intervals. This was more for the purp so it deceiving the savages than otherwise, for, immediately a rethe dusk of evening, and before the moon was sufficiently high to afford much light, a party of fifty, under the command of a lieutenant, commenced a circuit of the root is norder to reach the upper end of the Gate. As the way was rooth one, it was calculated that it would take the root of the night to accomplish this. Oakley accompanied the party as a guide.

The artiflery was kept in position at the lower on how is a time, and only sufficient men left to work the pieces. The house have such a fair of "big cruis," that they said an action to apt to charge them, therefore a "support" is at most to unnecessary.

The remainder of the troops were distanted to the large fantry, and the horses picketed matrician gas A of of the thek is a grant of the making a grant of the gra of attacking in that direction, while Marshall, with a hundred good men, took his course across a point of the Medicine Bow rilge, for the purpose of reaching the center of the Gate. Daylight was the hour appointed for the general attack.

Daring the night, the fire was seen which had been prepared for Quadaro; and, once or twice, Marshall had alm st al ternined to pour a volley into the cave, which he ceuld bet n listingtly see. But then Manonie might be there, as well as zis chill and Miss Oakley, and he might injure them. This was his greatest dread.

The morning dawned. Marshall's men were concealed in the rocks close by the Sweetwater, ready for a movement, One of his men had fired a shot, and it was that which struck the chief. It was most unfortunite that it did so, as he would Trob bly have prevented the fight and much blood would have been spared.

But the attack now commenced with fury. Marshall saw Lis wife and child upon the opposite side of the river. Oh, how willly his heart throbbed! And there was Mary Oakley, too, and the old hermit! They were standing in a position of great danger. The comman ler was greatly relieved when he saw Fair John lead them into the cave, where, at least, they would be safe from the shots of their own friends.

The men also saw their idol, the heroine of Laramie, and they only needed the command from Marshall to rush to the deadly encounter. It came.

"Forward, boys! Forward!"

A terrible shout went up as the hundred daring hearts are into the shallow Sweetwater and dashed for the other it. Up the sharp cliffs they tore, as men bent on victory or !. 'h They were met with many a deadly shot, and a num by of soldiers fell, pierced with the fatal bullet. But they firmed a shower of leaden hail quite terrible.

" (" iring!" cried Marshall, in frantic tones.

The case of this order was apparent. It was just at this instant that Wontum entered the cave, dragging Manonie forth. If another shot was fired it might pierce the heart of his beloved wife He expected to see her struck down upon the epot; but, on the contrary, the savage mounted a horse, placing his victim before him, and dashed off toward the valley above the Gate.

"Quick! The way is rocky, and we can overtake him?" cried Marshall. "Don't fire, but upon him with your sabers." A dozen sprung after the villain, while the others engaged those who had not accompanied him. But that conflict was short, as a surrender was immediately ordered by Nemona who, as soon as his senses returned, rushed from the cave using the conflict.

It may appear strange that a savage could mount a horse, and, with such a charge, ride swiftly and safely over dangerous, rocky places. But there are many of the tribes who are said absolutely to "live" in the saidle, and have trained their horses to such an extent, that they can ride where a civilized being could scarcely walk.

Wontum passed the rough places, and struck into a ravine, which led into a valley. That once reached, he felt that he would be safe, for none of his enemies were mounted, and, when the way was clear, he could easily outstrip them.

But horsemen stood directly across his path, in large numbers. Escape that way was now impossible. He cast his eyes behind him. On came the avenging husband and his friends. He looked up the side of the ravine. Here was his only chance. The passage was difficult, and he could not accomplish it with his burden. If he attempted it called her, would he not be riddled by the shots of his fact. No matter. It was but death, and that was cartain on every other han h Quickly he threw himself from his horse, drawting Manonic with him. The husband was not twenty rolls if in them.

"I'll be revenged yet!" yelled the savare. He rais I his knis over the poor captive, who now erached at his feet, and, in a breath, it would have fallen.

"Fire!" ened Harshall. This order was object, as the non-saw that the Ladian was in such a political they could reach him without danger of injury to Managin.

At the very moment, however, of the discharge of the velley, a form durted from among the rocks close at hand, and dealt the savage a blow upon the head with the butt of his musket, which scattered his brains in every direction. The blood thirsty wretch fell to the earth without so much as a grean.

SAVED.

It was a fortunate interposition, as the shots fired, although they probably would have proved fatal, would still have given him time to strike the blow which must have forever parted husband and wife. But she was saved, and, with a wild cry, she bounded into her beloved's arms.

"But Oakley; let us look to him," exclaimed Marshall.

After the first raptures of such a meeting had passed.

It was indeed Oakley who had stricken the blow.

"Oakley, are you much hurt?" asked Marshall, bendi.; over the fallen hero.

"Wal, I reck'n not very bad; guess I'll stick it out."

"Our boys did not see you when they fired."

"Of course not. I came up so sudden like. An' reck'n it's lucky for poor Manonie that I did. Where's little Molly?"

"Sue at the cave, I think," answered Marshall.

"Shall I see her before I die—before I join my poor wife in another world?" groaned Oakley.

" Let us hope it is no death-wound."

"Wal, for Molly's sake, I'll hope not. I think I can stand half-a-dozen bullets any time; but, I should think, by the weight, there was more than that in me. An'—cap'n, has one on 'em struck my eye?"

"No. I see no mark. Why do you ask?"

" Cos it's kinder growin' dark all around."

" Can you endure it, to be carried to the cave?"

" Is my little Molly there?"

" Yes."

"Then take me to her."

A litter was soon formed, and the old man placed upon it. But, before he reached the cave, he had become insensible.

Mary saw the approach of her father, and, supposing him field, her wails were pitiful, indeed. But Topeka examined his we make with her practiced hand and eye, and declared that with case, he could be saved. After applying some restoratives, the old soot opened his eyes, and smiling, spoke, in fields tones, to his child, showing that he recognized her. This filled her heart with hope, and, to some extent, she thared the happiness of those around her.

CHAPTER XIII

CONCLUSION.

THERE was much of sorrow to mar this meeting. Many of the soldiers had fallen. Peace would now be restored, and the one who had been the principal cause of all the trouble, Wontum, had met a just retribution.

Nemona, the chief, had been ministering to the old hermit. When the party approached, Old John was sitting etc., but his face was so covered with blood, which had thowel from a wound on the top of his head, but which the chief had stanched, that not a feature was visible. Nemona was standing by his side, looking the image of fear. He held a strangelooking thing in his hand.

"What is the matter?" asked Marshall.

"Old man's scalp!" said the Indian, trembling, as he hold up that which really did appear like the gray covering of the old hermit's head. A thought appeared to strike Marshall, and he said:

"Bring some water, and let me wash away this lived." This was done; and a pair of huge gray whi kers were removed.

" Quindaro!" cried a dozen voices.

It was, Indeed, Quindaro—or, Father John, the hermit—one and the same person! Mary was not the last to discover this, and was not sparing in her caresses and words of enlearment. Old Oakley had been watching, with much interest and then he said:

"I knew the old hero was your father, or that you was his father. But it times out that you are both enclosively father; or else both are each other's sons!" A laugh followel this, and he added:

"It's kinder mixed up, any way; but I 'spect it's all right."

"And is it, indeed, my Walter?" exclaimed Mary, in rapture. "And you are not very badly hurt—and father will recover—oh! we will all be so happy!" " Yes, it is your Walter, but not Quindaro."

" Not Quindaro!" echoed the friends.

"It is one whom you have known both as Quindar and the hermit. Now, listen to me. Nemona, you were ab at to tell me where Manonic resided when Wontum slaughtered the family and captured her."

"It was in Iowa, near Fort Des Moines, upon Raccoon river."

"Manonie," asked Walter, "have you no recollection of your early home?"

"Yes, but it is quite indistinct. I recollect kind fi ands, mother, father, and little ones with whom I used to play."

"By the side of the stream-"

"Yes-yes!" cried Manonie.

"Under a large willow!"

"Yes, I remember it!"

" And can you not recollect your name?"

"Let me think. It was—" Manonie placed her hands to her head, as if the gathering memories were mingling and forming into consistency and clearness.

" Was it Flor-"

" Florence-yes!" cried the now excited woman.

" Florence Mil-"

"Milburn-Florence Milburn-that was it. Oh! tell me if you are not-"

"I am not Quindaro, but I am Walter Milburn, your own brother !"

"Come, come, Flora, for so I shall call you now," said Marshall, in a playful manner, "don't hug that man any longer, or I shall certainly be jealous."

" And I, too, exclaimed Mary, laughingly, though there were terrs of joy standing in her eyes.

"Well, triends," said Walter, "this is indeed a happy meetatt. Bet, it will be necessary for me to make an explanation.
It was a dark night, nearly tifteen years since, that the horrible deed was committed which deprived me of all I had in the world to love. I knew our parents were among the slain, and so confident was I that not a soul escaped but myself, that it never appeared necessary to search further. I followed the Pawnees, first to Willow Lake, and then to this point. I found that I must have some repere, and to I assumed the character and disguise of the old hermit. I was compelled to go to St. Louis for that scalp which Nemona has just taken from my head, and for the whiskers. I have often wondered why I was not detected, but I suppose the reason was, the characters were so entirely antagonistic—so singularly different, that I was not suspected."

"How did you manage to make your changes so swidenly!" asked Marshall.

"At the time I was in the mountain with Oakley and yourself, and never until now, did I wish my real character known.
And so I left you and made the change. I always carry my wig and whiskers in my bosom, unless I am wearing them.
The change of clothing is done simply by turning my coat."

"But how did you manage the double character here?"

"I followed Manonie to the mountains, little dreaming that I was pursuing my own sister. I rescued her and brought her to my own cabin. There I was surprised and captured.

"Well," continued Walter, "after a hard run up the hill, I found myself almost surrounded, and escape impossible. So I threw off my Indian garments, donned my friendly wir and whiskers, turned my coat, and was then again captured, and prought into the stronghold, as a peacemaker. The remaining portion of the story you know. But now that the one who committed that horrible 'ced is c'ead. I shall henceforth cease my work of blood."

Gur friends are all yet happy. Oakley recovered and resides with his children, upon the banks of the bright Des Moines—Walter, and Mary his wife. Marshall and Maronie could not be happier than they are with little Harry, their only born.

Thus ends this story, not too remantic for a roman e, n retoo strange for truth. Quindance and the Hanouna or Forr Larance or, reatures not all coined of the imagination.

STANDARD DIME DIALOGUES

For School Enhibitions and Home Entertainments.

Nos. 1 to 21 inchange. 15 to 25 Popular Dialogues and Dramas in each book. Each volume 12) 12 no pages, sent pest pard, on receipt of price, feu cents.

Beadle & Adams, Publishers, 98 William St., N. T.

These volumes have been present with especial reference to their availability for Patterner, . . is to i to and a series with or with or with of the fare i a stage, and some it a be-AND Y IN FIRE PLES of every era, but many and terms. It is to assume to the The second and areas, at any prese, contain sometry useral and available dialogues and drames wit, pathos, humor and sentiment,

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 1.

H . ... Frire speakers. in grita "! .... I rregung laive. Tro Se ret. (Sa cros. I rt. coaresham. a ration to the same for three parts. Y and Attend to I restricted and to the steel . and a to the total farmants. I Japan in & Prestors. Pour ferrison, course .. f a lyundile I at suit almel. Fort me marriage was the I at the true to the terms of t lagration. I river teachers, the same to the first transfer Tologe the contract between . . come fully. I the . to.og : se The Fat Young Man, I rtun to beg. I will fire . Part or a les

To be a like to the Malean Cornele. The learn like 12 12 min and 1 main Mrs. The transfer to be the first to be a first the first termine for we calling . I will be a bound brokers To be more in the low to the land

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 2.

TAGER . Two males. Two males. the section of the section of the Section of the Francia I all all sever maracters. A Seven and Last. Friwe makes I a _____ I so I weaped two for a earlie toron, The Francisco, 's o . . . . . . . . Several formance. I a Tree Monof - wee. Fir for males. The total tank to War and the terms of the contract of the con I a ter A to the the City. For sev. The In ellipsephers. For two - egities How to be I am Heir. For five names. ere calera. Tuiner ... s. I'r two mies. ILOVIENCE. I PEX your income. The state of the s A ( r ll gua. To be the second of the second of the second of The I was seg. Five males and one females

2 2 ... . . 2 FB .Fm C 1 2 13. To English Traveler. For two maios. DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 3.

To the liver free or to a 1. The Civited Control Control of I am from formales | The termine | The termi the second to th " . I to the terms of the White I am I for the i just as a Classing.

The late of a color of the late of the late of the second of the late of the l

DIME DILLOGUE, NO. 4.

Totales (Telephone et energy (Telephone Vinter, Tenelos, 15 males the state of the s The second secon and the property of the Prince of I see that the second of the s

DIME DIALOCUES, NO. 5.

Transfer Comments to the Training party. I TOP I TOP I The state of the s Con and I I . At . . . I take . . The season of th And the second second second second the same of the sa the state of the s the state of the s I will as a little of the A Comment of the same. I. w. . . to that an Allen or, god two learning.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 5. Total Transfer to the second of the second o Covered Fresh arefresh The bar and the contract of the contract. FIRAN SEC. that fortal a locality but to be a second to the be wante Forth Seven tomas ease I two makes I to I a to but two ferms and the business of the bus A to make the day to the state of the state I a transport Jam Fire gran es. THE REST AND THE PROPERTY AND ADDRESS OF THE PARTY AND THE 1. we investigate the transfer to

Burgers & of tures mayor and out louisages

DIME SCHOOL SERIES .- Speakers and Dialogues,

DIME DIALECT SPEAKER, No. 23.

D. t's wat's do matter, Ali ab nit a bec. To Mas as pol n. racie, wandel, ern to tall course to, D. se lams vot Mary ha! Fe peacer viev, 10 Pat O'Flicherty on wo I liary's same a vite amb 11 " 5 Fin 14, Time recers, how Tobias so to speak, T . " at thes," He and Dawson on A paredy, 4 * 1 * 4 . 12 4 4 18 . I'm . d . t ser, the farm Tet . e story of Frank Loss & senter. would I were a boy again. A pathetic story.

A dura ande view, on terribing verman, A hea thy d ser urse, Und Mrs. Grans, Mars and cats, Birl Caserwood, priot, Lid Granley, lie but beddler's ora List th.

Green's

Latest Chinese outrage, My reightor's dues, Fire manufest destiny o. ( . a fet sed My thorogat t. e l' tunt, Programme of rijs ir m Jah Di 1-11-5 De orientation es ob de S L. W .. 1. . . . Dar's milia rew unier I e ce 3 ..., A Neur In. of rospice. I be alter and I 1 41 7. .. . Periters : Out C Librait's Yithd, Dur dreary's triadam. last Place language by truck . fur June,

The second A per en se . . . . Ale and the are in bird of liberty, 1 . C C W. West,

DIME DIALOGUES No. 26.

Four consins. Three ladies and two gentlemen. The lesson of mercy. Two very small girls. Mount iche and thole ..... Six ladies and several Practice what you present four lawies. a e l'ilema words,

· dace

A cear that and not fail. Six burs.

Two was a of seeing to the Two little girls.

Da't coult your chargets bette tuey are train. Iwo Dance.

intened. Four latter and a boy. And is 'atr. . love and war, 3 ladies, 2 gentler en. F. . . . . . . . . Tree young .a...... him time a Josh got rid of the legacy. I wo makes, How Jim Peters died. Two makes. Walm several transformations.

Per la min. A sincrous characters. The covering agent. Two manes and awd fe tenley. A sight scare. Tirree females and one male.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 27.

Patsey O'Dowd's campaign. For three males The street got's good argel. For two ladies and and one femmes. 200 $ Demetented Apple. For several g rla A double serverise. Four maies and one female. What was it? For five ladies. We at well cure them? For a lady and two beys, 'en entreed cure. For severa, contactors, It is endent. For numerous characters. Each season the best. For four boys-Tried and from wanting. For several males.

two ! tie . s. Many inferences not always just. Nunerous "That you to all the tager" For two males. I I tad the range. I retree "the gra-Appear to are one come for several ladies ALTERESTE N. Love's protest. For two little girls. Loose who preach and there was performe for three males.

A gentle compact. For two young guila-A boy's plot. For several characters.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 28.

A test that told. For six young indices and two Nor confir the dray. For three little boys. g ptleren. Or can are g a debating exciety. For four bore. Teanasent g. For feur autie gir s. I so relieve proper. For 3 gentlemen, " lad ca. ha we want and exclapated. For a a la was ecteates it to fonce. For four marea.

Arms-clear, har til ser in characters, Meas refer thousare. Print a. For two makes and two Taved 11 & dies ... fort to a R An It's . "Te sure. For four time, Agend the for the ser, I rexulteges. The special fills wood. For two troupes of girls. At agreentle profession. For severa, commenting

? The above broks are soil by Newsleadure everywhere, or wan be sout, put puid, the will use, On Faculti of price, 10 could on the BEADLE & ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.

STANDARD BOOKS OF GAMES AND PASTIMES.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

DIME BASE-BALL PLAYER FOR 1880.

Containing the Individual Chub Records of the International and League All lives Chals of 1870, including all the Single Figure Games they played; also the Legan and International Championship Records of 1879; together with the Media Contracts of the Season, both in the Amateur and Professional Arena, By Henry Charwick.

HAND-BOOK OF CROQUET.

A Complete Guide to the Principles and Practice of the Game. This popular racing s, durage the few years of its existence, rapidly outgrown the first vague and regulations of its inventor; and, as almost every house at The last lay la! pisad firent code of laws, it becomes a difficult matter for I struct r to assimilate his play to that of other people. It is, therefore, highly of this work is to establish a recognized method of playing the game.

DIME BOOK OF 100 GAMES.

Ont door and in door SUMMER GAMES for Tourists and Families in the Conn-'ry, Prances, etc., comprising 100 Games, Forfeits and Conundrums for Childhood " IY ... Single und Married, Grave and Gay. A Pocket Hand-book for the Summer Season.

CRICKET AND FOOT-BALL.

'. de Cri. '. r's Com; wion, containing complete instructions in the ele-. : I live, by Batt by and Problem; also the Revised Laws of the Game; Rethe Dates of Impires; the Mary-le Bone Cricket Club Rules and Regu-Lations; Bets, etc. By Henry Chadwick.

HAND-BOOK OF PEDESTRIANISM.

'. v '. the Rul a for Training and Practice in Walking, Running, Leaping, Y .:: the Late I by Henry Chalwick.

YACHTING AND ROWING.

This value will be found very complete as a guide to the conduct of watercraft, If the fir 'eres' har information alike to the amateur and the novice. The chap-Friends the great rewing-match of the Oxford and Cambridge clubs on the This was befored particularly interesting.

RIDING AND DRIVING.

A sure ratio to correct Hersomanship, with complete directions for the road and it: In questrians and information for female equestrians. I ten, it it in "Stor. here" fire manual, this volume will be found all .to the desirably to a condition all about the horse, and his maragement in harness and under the saddle.

GUIDE TO SWIMMING.

Car sig Ala - ry Instructions; Rules upon Enterner the Water; General I carrier: Divit it Hew to Come to the Surface: Swimming on ' li : ... who we am the the rest in the state of the rest of the . II w '. M I - is Charact Dr. William; Dr. Franklin's Code for Swimmers; . . .: red. Breegt. P. . p Peterson.

of price-ren cents each.

BRADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS, 98 WILLIAM ST., N. Y.

BEADLE'S NEW DIME NOVELS.

482 The fre Change by 416 Death's Head Ran-369 Metamora. 322 Old Grizzly. 4nd The Tw trustus. 370 Thornpath, Trailer. 323 Dasting Dragoons. 4 .4 (au tar. 417 Captain of Captains. 324 Will-o'-the-Wisp. 371 Foul-wea her Jack. dut to be on a 418 Warrior Princess. 372 The Black Rider. 325 Dashing Dick. and The Lan. It vets. 419 The Blue Band. 313 The Helpiese Hand. 326 Old Crosstire. det Ned Starling. 420 The Squaw Chief. 374 The Lake Rangers. 327 Ben Brambie. and Gag o Hard 421 The Flying Scout. 375 Alone on the Plains. 328 Brigand Captain. and Toxan, the Texan. 422 Sonora Ben. 376 Phantom Horseman. 329 Old Strategy. 47 · Young Mustarger. 473 The Sea King 330 Gray Hair, Chief, 317 Winona-401 The Biunted Life. 424 Mountain Gid. 378 Silent Shot. 231 Prairie Tigers. 4"v The Buffam Trapper. 425 Denth-Trailer. 379 The Phantom Ship. 832 Rival Hunters. 4"3 C. J Z.p. 426 The Created Serpent. 233 Texan Scout, 380 The Red Rider. 474 F at 10 Ft L 407 Arkansas Kit. 381 Grizzly-Hunters. 334 Zebra Zack. 4"5 M as -t, to Brave. 438 The Cornair Prince. 3-2 The Mad Ranger. 335 Masked Messenger. 476 St. W-1 73. Ethan Allen's R des. 3 The Specter Skipper. 336 Morgan, the Pirate. 4"? liver w's . r. le. 4d Little Thunderbolt. The Red Coyote. 337 The Boy Spy. 4" Vld Honesty. The Falcon Rover. 3 13 Table, the Trailer. Bas The Hunchback. 4 9 Hald Esgle. 4-2 Honest Hand. 2nd The Black Wizard. 339 The Boy Chief. 450 Black Princess. 454 The St no Chief. The Mad Horseinan. 34) Tim, the Trailer. 4-1 The White Brave. 4nd The Gold Demon. 341 Red Az, the Glant. 3 " Privateer's Bride. 4. The Rifleman of the 4 > Eutawan, Slaver 359 Jaguar Queen. 842 Stella, the Spy. Miami 4 The Masked Guide. 390 Shadow Jack. 343 White Avencer. 1. The Mores Hunter. 437 The Conspirators. 391 Engle P ume. 314 The Indian King. 4-4 The Brigantine. 4 - Swiftwing, Squaw. 394 Ocean Outlaw. 345 The Long Trail. is Put Pomfret's Ward. 4 Caribou Zie. 333 Red Slayer. 346 Kirk, the Guide. Simple Phil. 440 The Privateer. 347 The Phantom Trail. The Phantom foe. Jo Davices's Client. 441 The Black Spy. 343 The Apache Guide. Blue Anchor. 4-4 1 . 1 1a 4 1. 442 The Doonied Hunter. 349 The Mad Minur. Red skin's Pledge. THE PARTY NAMED IN 44 Barden, the Ranger. 250 Keen-eye, Ranger, " Quadroon Spy. and the same of the 444 Th Gray Scalp. Black Rover. 351 Blue Belt, Guide. 2 1 11 1 1 in The Peddler Spy. 3 Red Belt 352 On the Trail. 4 THE PART OF THE 4 m The White Cance. 4 The Two Trails. 358 The Specier Spy. 4 Tele 1 .. 447 Eph Peters 4 The Ice-Flend. 354 Old Bald-bend. 418 Te Two Hunters. and The bear and . 4 2 The Red Prince. 355 Red Knite, Chief. 4 5 1. m. - A-4 11 The Traitor Spy 4 2 The First Teail. 356 Sib Con , Trapper. Jan Transmit Take. 4 The Gray Hunter. 357 The Bear-Hunter. 44 Sheet-Anchor Tom. 4 of the first war. 4" | Little Nocessin. 4 5 Old Avoirdapois. or the full built ... Sagamore of Saco. 452 The White Hermit. 4 5 Wite Californ The William Child. The King's Man. 45? The Island Stride. 407 Blue Clipper. e ( et as, the S orge Affort and Ashore. 454 The Forest Princess. 4 Red Dan. TO. The Sq aw Spy. 50) The Wrong Man. 455 The Trail Hunters. 4 3 The Fire-Eater. 3 ! ha ut of 'TA. 50% The Rangers of the 425 rackwoods Banditti. 41 Blackbawk. 1-15-15 4. Ja K. Mohawk. 4 7 Ruby Rolan4. 411 The Lost Ship. 364 Masked Spv. 503 The Double Hero. 41's Laughing Eyes. 412 Black Arrow. 365 Kirk, the Renegade. Sad Alice Wilde. 4 Mohegan Malden. 413 White Serpent. 366 Dingle, the Outlaw. sus Ruth Margerie. 4 The Quaker Scout 414 The Lost Captain. 3 7 The Green Ranger. 5 8 Privateer's Cruise. 441 Sunter's Scouts. 415 The Twin Trailers. . . Montbars, Scourge.

The following will be issued in the order and on the dates indicated:

507-The Indian Queen. By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. Ready January 21.

508-The Wrecker's Prize. By Henry J. Thomas. Ready January 17th.

509-The Slave Sculptor. By William Jared Hall. Ready January 31st.

510-The Backwoods Bride. By Mrs. M. V. Vict r. Ready February 11th. 511-Chip, the Cave Child. By Mrs. M. A. Denison. Realy February With.

512-Bill Biddon, Trapper. By Edward S. Ellis. Ready March 14th.

513-Outward Bound. By Roger Starbuck. Ready March 28th.

514-East and West. By Mrs. F. F. Barrett. Ready April 11th. 515-The Indian Princess. By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. Ready April Mich.

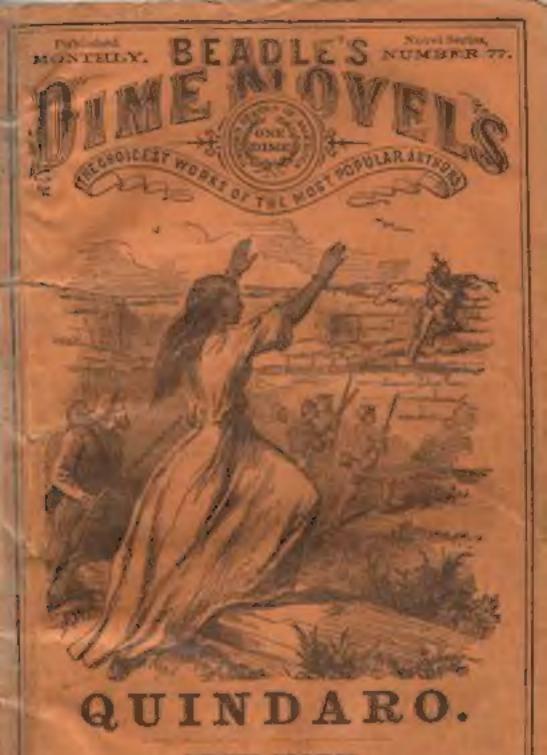

516-The Forest Spy. By Edward S. Ellis. Ready May 9th.

517-Graylock, the Guide. By C. D. Clark. Ready May 23d.

518-Off and On. By John S. Warner. Ready June 6th.

519-Seth Jones. By Edward S. Ellis. Ready June 20th.

Published semi-monthly. For sale by all newsdealers; or sent post-part: single numbers, ten cents; six months (13 Nos.) $1.25; one year (26 Nos.) $2.50.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, US WILLIAM ST General Dime Book Publishers.

The Magazine for 1867!

The popular and widely-read

BEADLE'S MONTELLY

A Magazine of To-Day,

turposes fine things for the New Year. Second to none in the variety of its matter and the ability of its writers, it will more than ever command the interest of those seeking for a thoroughly original American Monthly. Among its premiums are:

To any person sending us three dollars for one NEW subscriber to Bradle's Monthly, the most popular of American Magazines, we will send as premium, prepaid, any ten Dime Books selected from our catalogue.

For two NEW subscribers and six dollars we will send, as above, meenty-five Dime Books.

For list of other premiums, or catalogues, address

BEADLE AND COMPANY, 118 William Street, New York.

BEADLE'S DIME SCHOOL SERIES.

Conceded favorites are these excellent books, in schools, classes and homes. The list comprises:

SPEAKER SEKIES.

No. 1.-DIME AMERICAN SPEAKER.

No. 2.—DIME NATIONAL SPEAKER.

No. 8 .- DIME PATRIOTIC SPEAKER.

No. 4.-DIME COMIC SPEAKER.

No. 5. - DIME ELOCUTIONIST.

No. 6 .- DIME HUMOROUS SPEAKER.

DIALUGUE SERIES.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. ONE.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. Two.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. THEEE.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. FOUR.

DIALOGUES, No. FIVE.

DIME SCHOOL MELODIST, Music and Words.

Schools and classes supplied at reduced rates. Special terms to teachers.

BEADLE'S DIME FAMILY HAND-BOOKS.

Prepared expressly for this series, and adapted particularly to American hands and homes. They are:

DIME COOK BOOK.

DIME RECIPE BOOK.

DIME FAMILY PHYSICIAF

DIME DRESS-MAKER AND MILLINER'S GUIDE.

BEADLE'S POPULAR HAND-BOOKS.

Of proven standard excellence--literally, "dollar books for a dime." viz.:

DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE.

DIME BOOK OF VERSES

DIME LETTER-WRITER.

DIME BOOK OF DREAMS.

All of Beadle's Dime Publications are sent post free, on receipt of price.

TEN CENTS EACH. They are, also, sold generally by the news trade.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 118 William Street. H T

BEADLE'S

DIME SCHOOL SERIES

Heaven and Compare the Compare to the late the lates of higher desirable is affined to brooks prepared the compared to be about a families, etc.

SPEAKERS.

Dime American Sporker,	Brender Series	200.2.]
Dime National Speaker,	[ "	200.01
Dime Patriotic Speaker,	I n	No. E.
Dime Comio Speaker,	1 "	No. 4.)
Dime Elecutionist,	4 *	No. 5.]
Dime Humorous Speaker,		Sec 5.]

These nucles are regions with the second for the School course on Experience of the theory of the tipoer.

DIALOGUES.

Dime Dialogues, Number One.
Dime Dialogues, Number Two.
Dime Dialogues, Number Three
Dime Dialogues, Number Four.
Dime Dialogues, Number Five.

These votes as here team property is a second of recent to their we habited in all exhaust comes. They are adapted to schools with a without the land land a winger and full charters are full second as at overy made, he made and formula. It is felt to assume that we will see the property of the propert

Dime School Melodist, (Music and Words.)

The sentenced to echopie of an employee with contrast of an age. It counting to entirely shall write our services with a partie entry of a first or a manufacture of the first our and the first of the first of the first out of t

Prior building Course and Land by a remains from all to like again. For an by all Neumannians or will be seen a mail as in packages by mail, profession of prior course seems and to Tambers.

For Country was of Boulle's luma Publications want free on application, BEADLE & COMPANY, General Dime Book Publishers.

118 William Street, M. Y.

Beadle's Standard Dime Publications.

HOVELS.

1. Malaeska.

2. The Privateer's Cruise. 3. Myra, Child of Adopt'n.

4. Alice Wilde.

5. The Golden Belt.

6. Chip, the Cave-Child.

7. The Reefer of '76.

8. Seth Jones.

9. The Slave Sculptor.

10. The Backwoods' Bride,

11. Prison'r of LaVintresse 12. Bill Biddon, Trapper.

13. Cedar Swamp.

14. The Emerald Necklace.

The Frontier Angel.

Uncle Ezekiel. Madge Wylde.

18. Nat Todd.

19. Massasoit's Daughter. 20. Florida, the Iron Will.

21. Sybil Chase.

22. The Maid of Esopus. 23, Winifred Winthrop.

24. The Trail Hunters.

25. The Peon Prince. 26. Brethren of the Coast.

27. Daughter of Liberty.

28 King Barnaby.

29. The Forest Spy. 80. Put. Pomfret's Ward.

81. The Double Hero.

82. Irona.

83. Maum Guinea, 20 cents.

34. Ruth Margerie. 35. East and West.

36. Riflemen of the Miami.

37. Godbold, the Spy. 88. The Wrong Man.

39. The Land-Claim.

40. Unionist's Daugh'r, 20c.

41. The Hunter's Cabin. 42. The King's Man.

43. The Allens.

44. Agnes Falkland.

45. Esther.

46. Wreck of the Albion.

47. Tim Bumble's Charge. 48. Oonomoo, the Huron.

49. The Gold Hunters.

50. The Black Ship. 51. The Two Guards.

52. Single Eye.

53. Hates and Loves.

54. Myrtle, Child of Prairie.

55. Off and On. 56. Ahmo's Plot.

57. The Scout. 58. The Mad Hunter.

59. Kent, the Ranger. 60. Jo Daviess' Client.

61. Laughing Eyes.

62. The Unknown.

63. The Indian Princess.

64. Rangersofthe Mohawk. 65. The Wrecker's Prize.

66. The Hunter's Vow.

67. Indian Jim.

68. The Brigantine. 69. Black Hollow,

70. The Indian Queen.

71. The Lost Trail.

72. The Moose Hunter. 73. The Silver Bugle.

74. Cruiser of Chesapeake.

75. The Hunter's Escape. 76. The Scout's Prize,

77. Quindaro.

78. The Rival Scouts. 79. Schuylkill Rangers.

80. Eagle Eye.

81. The Two Hunters.

82. The Mystic Canoe.

83. The Golden Harpoon. 84. The Seminole Chief.

85. The Fugitives.

86. Red Plume. 87. On the Deep.

88. Captain Molly.

89. Star Eyes. 90. Cast Away.

91. The Lost Cache. 92. The Twin Scouts.

93. The Creole Sisters. 94. The Mad Skipper.

95. Eph Peters.

96, Little Moccasin.

97. The Doomed Hunter.

98. Ruth Harland. 99, Overhoard.

100. Karaibo.

101. Maid of Wyoming. 102. Hearts Forever.

103. Big Foot, the Guide.

104. Guilty or not Guilty.

105. Man in Green. 106. Simple Phil.

107. The Peddler Spy.

108. The Lost Ship.

109. Kidnapped.

110. The Hidden Home. 111. The Shawness Foe.

112. The Falcon Rover,

113. Rattlepate. 114. Ned Starling.

115. The Sons of Liberty.

116.

117.

FIGTION.

1. The Marked Bullet.

2. The Outlaw Brothers. 3. The Willing Captive.

4. The Deer Hunters. 5. The Dacotah Queen.

6. Missing Jo.

7. Gottlieb Gottsoock.

8. Prairie Chick.

9. Roving Ben. BIOGRAPHIES.

1. Garibaldi.

2. Daniel Boone.

3. Kit Carson.

4. Anthony Wayne.

5. David Crockett. 6. Winfield Scott.

7. Pontiac:

8. John C. Fremont.

9. John Paul Jones. 10. Marquis de Lafayette.

11. Tecumseh.

12. Gen. G. B. McClellan.

13. Parson Brownlow.

14. Abraham Lincoln

15. Ulysses S. Grant. Men of the Time, Nos. 1, 2, 3

SCHOOL SERIES.

Speakers, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, Dialogues Nos. 1, 2, 3, & 4 Melodist. School Melodist.

FAMILY SERIES.

1. Cook Book.

2. Recipe Book.

3. Housewife's Manual.

4. Family Physician.

5. Dressmak'g& Millinery

POPULAR HAND-BOOKS.

Letter-Writer. Book of Etiquette. Book of Verses.

Book of Dreams. HAND-BOOKS OF GAMES.

Book of Croquet.

Chess Instructor. Book Cricket and Football Base-Ball Player for 1866. Guide to Swimming.

SONG BOOKS. Song Books, Nos. 1 to 18. Pocket Songster, Nos. 1101

LIBRARY.

1. White-Faced Pacer.

2. Blacksmith of Antwerp. 3. The Maiden Martyr.

4. The Loyalist.

5. The Country Cousin.

6. The Messenger,

MISSELLANDUS. Year Book & Almanac, 1867 Grant's Report.

Sherman's Reports. American Battles No. 1. Book of Fun Nos. 12 and 3

Robinson Crusoe (Illust a) New House that Jack Bulit

For Sale by all Newsdealers. Sent post-paid on receipt of TEN CENTS. BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 118 William St., N. Y.